THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

DR. MAGGIEL'S

Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these

LIFE-GIVING PILLS!

Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, but to cure. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be

A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,

For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, that Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever

AN ETERNAL SPRING!

It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.

THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES

Cannot stay the flight of years, but they can force back, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, but seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—

FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS

Nothing can be more productive of cure than these Pills. Their almost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest

VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.

FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS

And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, but penetrates with the most searching effects to the very root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills

Invariably cure the following diseases:

Asthma,
Bowel Complaints,
Coughs,
Colds,
Chest Diseases,
Costiveness,
Dyspepsia,
Diarrhœa,
Dropsy,
Debility,
Female Complaints, Fever and Ague
Headache,
Indigestion,
Influenza,

OCCIDENTAL

HOMESTEAD

Association,

OFFICE, - - - 305 MONTGOMERY STREET.

CAPITAL STOCK, $33,660.

102 SHARES.....$330 EACH.

THIS ASSOCIATION was formed to enable its members to obtain desirable homestead lots in this city at a cheap and easy rate, paying for the same by regular monthly instalments.

For this purpose they have purchased Blocks 409, 500, and 501, in the Western Addition to this city, bounded by Devisadero, Pine, Broderick and Clay streets.

Subscribers will pay an initiation fee of $5 on each share taken, to form a fund for defraying current expenses, and $11 per month for thirty months, commencing in April, 1866.

The property is within three blocks of the

TURK STREET RAILROAD,

IS NEARLY ALL ON THE GRADE,

and is most desirably located for Homestead purposes.

It is directly east from the lands of the California Association.

The property has been purchased on very reasonable terms, and offers a rare opportunity for investment.

A number of fine houses are in process of erection, and streets are being graded near this property, which will greatly increase its value.

When twelve monthly payments have been made, the property will be divided among the members in the usual manner, and each shareholder will receive a contract for a deed to the lot or lots to which he may be entitled, and have the privilege of taking immediate possession of the same.

The lots average 27 feet in front by 120 feet in depth The whole amount due upon any lot may be paid at any time, and discount at the rate of one and one-half per cent. per month will be deducted therefrom.

Persons wishing to visit the lands of this Association will take the Turk street cars to Devisadero street, and thence go northerly along Devisadero to Pine street.

Twenty thousand dollars of the capital stock is taken, and the books are open for subscription to the balance at the office of the Secretary, where the Official Map of the Association can be seen, and full particulars obtained.

The Title to this Property is Perfect.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure, but

NEWELL'S

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup.

Hair Restorer AND Hair Dresser

BOTH COMBINED IN ONE.

First—It is not a Dye.

Second—Will not Color the Skin.

Third—Will restore Gray Hair to a beautiful Black, Brown, Auburn, or whatever might have been its original color, and cause it to assume its former beauty.

Fourth—Will cure all Humors and Diseases of the Scalp.

Fifth—Will remove Dandruff and Scurf from the head, and keep the hair moist and silk like in its appearance as in youthful days.

Sixth—Will promote a healthy growth.

Seventh—Will prevent it from falling off, and cause it to grow on bald heads where there is life and vitality at the roots, but where these are gone there is no hope of success.

Eighth—The best testimony that can be given will be found inside of each bottle.

Warranted to do all we claim for it, or the money refunded after using two bottles. Try it and be convinced.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea-sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

SPARKING SISTER'S BEAU.

"NOT at home this evening, Mister,
Very sorry, sir," I said,
When Ned Collins asked for sister,
Just as chickens go to bed.
Can't he "take?" the tiresome fellow;
Does he think she'll yet come in?
Will he stay till blue turns yellow,
And his wretched small-talk spin?
Stupid things are many,
Stupid things and slow;
Stupidest of any,
Sparking sister's beau.

"Does your sister like this poet?
Did she hear Miss so-and so?"
How I yawn! He'll surely know it;
Will he never, never go?
"Tell Miss Emma—" "Yes, I'll tell her
I'm a substitute no more,
'Tis the last time I will 'spell' her
With this everlasting bore."
Eight—nine—ten—eleven!
Oh! the weary hours!
Send me, gracious Heaven,
No such poppy flowers.

Low and cool the fire is burning,
Bright the moon shines on the snow;
Wish myself a sleigh o'er-turning,
So I'd spill out sister's beau.
One eye shuts—I prop the other,
Still his voice in ceaseless roll,
Talks of Emma—oh, the bother!
"Emma's beauty"—"Emma's soul;"
Yes, he's worse than nightmare,
And I'll die, I know,
Of another evening
Sparking sister's beau.

Wonder if the case would alter
If he spoke of me alone?
Told me with a loving falter,
In his rich and manly tone,
That his heart is mine forever;
That he loves and loves me so?
O, good gracious! shall I never
Have for mine some "killing" beau?
Think it would be different,
Yes it would, I know,
If 'twas Johnnie Snodgrass,
'Stead of sister's beau.

Gone at last! and almost midnight;
Well, I'm glad to creep to bed,
Wonder if in blessed dream-land
I can drive him from my head?
O, sweet memory! bring no vision,
Fraught with direst woe,
Into Slumber's realm elysian,
Vision of my sister's beau.
Let me fall from tower!
Let me choke with tow!
So I never, never dream of
Sparking sister's beau.

DENNAR STEUART.

"MARK TWAIN" AT THE ISLANDS.

A LUCRATIVE OFFICE.

WHEN I woke up on the schooner's deck in the morning, the sun was shining down right fervently, everybody was astir, and Brown was gone—gone in a canoe to Captain Cook's side of the bay, the Captain said. I took a boat and landed on the opposite shore, at the port of entry. There was a house there—I mean a foreigner's house—and near it were some native grass huts. The Collector of this port of entry not only enjoys the dignity of office, but has emoluments also. That makes it very nice, of course. He gets five dollars for boarding every foreign ship that stops there, and two dollars more for filling out certain blanks attesting such visit. As many as three foreign ships stop there in a single year, sometimes. Yet, notwithstanding this wild rush of business, the late Collector of the port committed suicide several months ago. The foreign ships which visit this place are whalers in quest of water and potatoes. The present Collector lives back somewhere—has a den up the mountain several thousand feet—but he comes down fast enough when a ship heaves in sight.

WASHOE MEN.

I found two Washoe men at the house. But I was not surprised; I believe if a man were to go to perdition itself he would find Washoe men there, though not so thick, maybe, in the other place.

"MARK" WANTS TO STUDY ANATOMY.

At noon I observed a bevy of nude native young ladies bathing in the sea, and went down to look at them. But with a prudery which seems to be characteristic of that sex everywhere, they all plunged in with a lying scream, and when they rose to the surface they only just poked their heads out and showed no disposition to proceed any further in the same direction. I was naturally irritated by such conduct, and therefore I piled their clothes up on a boulder in the edge of the sea and sat down on them and kept the wenches in the water until they were pretty well used up. I had them in the door, as the missionaries say. I was comfortable, and I just let them beg. I thought I could freeze them out, may be, but it was impracticable. I finally gave it up and went away, hoping that the rebuke I had given them would not be lost upon them. I went and undressed and went in myself. And then they went out. I never saw such singular perversity. Shortly a party of children of both sexes came floundering around me, and then I quit and left the Pacific ocean in their possession.

The ancient heathen temple spoken of below, stands near the scene of Capt. Cook's murder, on the island of Hawaii:

THE HERO OF THE SUNDAY SCHOOL BOOKS.

The high chief cook of this temple—the priest who presided over it and roasted the human sacrifices—was uncle to Obookia, and at one time that youth was an apprentice-priest under him. Obookia was a young native of fine mind, who, together with three other native boys, was taken to New England by the captain of a whaleship during the reign of Kamehameha I., and were the means of attracting the attention of the religious world to their country and putting it into their heads to send missionaries there. And this Obookia was the very same sensitive savage who sat down on the church steps in Connecticut, and wept because his people did not have the Bible. That incident has been very elaborately painted in many a charming Sunday School book—aye, and told so plaintively and so tenderly that I have cried over it in Sunday School myself, on general principles, although at a time when I did not know much and could not understand why the people of the Sandwich Islands need care a cent whether they had the Bible or not, as long as they were not aware that there was such a book in existence. This was the same Obookia—this was the very same old Obookia—so I reflected, and gazed upon the ruined temple with a new and absorbing interest. Here that gentle spirit worshiped; here he sought the better life, after his rude fashion; on this stone, perchance, he sat down with his sacred lasso, to wait for a chance to rope in some neighbor for the holy sacrifice; on this altar, possibly, he broiled his venerable grandfather, and presented the rare offering before the high priest, who may have said, "Well done, good and faithful servant." It filleth me with emotion.

The "monument" referred to in the following paragraph, is a cocoa-nut stump which was severed by a cannon-ball fired at the natives from one of Capt. Cook's ships, immediately after the murder of the great navigator. Each British naval commander who has visited Kealakekua Bay during the past thirty years, has nailed a rough sheet of copper to the stump commemorating such visit. England has vouchsafed no more dignified tribute than this to the great services of her distinguished son:

THE SHAMELESS BROWN.

I got uneasy about Brown finally, and as there were no canoes at hand, I got a horse whereon to ride three or four miles around to the other side of the bay and hunt him up. As I neared the end of the trip, and was riding down the "pathway of the gods" toward the sea in the sweltering sun, I saw Brown toiling up the hill in the distance, with a heavy burden on his shoulder, and knew that canoes were scarce with him, too. I dismounted and sat down in the shade of a crag, and after a while—after numerous pauses to rest by the way—Brown arrived at last, fagged out, and puffing like a steamboat, and gently eased his ponderous burden to the ground—the cocoanut stump all sheathed with copper memorials to the illustrious Captain Cook.

"Heavens and earth!" I said, "what are you going to do with that?"

"Going to do with it!—lemme blow a little—lemme blow—it's monstrous heavy, that log is; I'm most tired out—going to do with it! Why, I'm going to take her home for a specimen."

"You egregious ass! March straight back again and put it where you got it. Why, Brown, I am surprised at you—and hurt. I am grieved to think that a man who has lived so long in the atmosphere of refinement which surrounds me can be guilty of such vandalism as this. Reflect, Brown, and say if it be right—if it be manly—if it be generous—to lay desecrating hands upon this touching tribute of a great nation to her gallant dead? Why, Brown, the circumnavigator Cook labored all his life in the service of his country; with a fervid soul and a fearless spirit, he braved the dangers of the unknown seas and planted the banner of England far and wide over their beautiful island world. His works have shed a glory upon his active land which still lives in her history to-day; he laid down his faithful life in her service at last, and, unforgetful of her son, she yet reveres his name and praises his deeds—and in token of her love, and in reward for the things he did for her, she has reared this monument to his memory—this symbol of a nation's gratitude—which you would defile with unsanctified hands. Restore it—go!"

"All right, if you say so; but I don't see no use of such a spread as you're making. I don't see nothing so very high-toned about this old rotton chunk. It's about the ornerycst thing for a monument I've ever struck yet. If it suits Cook, though, all right; I wish him joy; but if I was planted under it I'd highst it, if it was the last act of my life. Monument! it ain't fit for a dog—I can buy dead loads of just such for six bits. She puts this over Cook—but she put one over that foreigner—what was his name?—Prince Albert—that cost a million dollars—and what did he do? Why, he never done anything—never done anything but lead a gallus, comfortable life, at home and out of danger, and raise a large family for Government to board at £300,000 a year apiece. But with this fellow, you know, it was different. However, if you say the old stump's got to go down again, down she goes. As I said before, if it's your wishes, I've got nothing to say. Nothing to say. Nothing only this—I've fetched her a mild or a mild and a half, and she weighs a hundred and fifty I should judge, and if it would suit Cook just as well to have her planted up here instead of down there, it would be considerable of a favor to me."

I made him shoulder the monument and carry it back, nevertheless. His criticisms on the monument and its patron struck me, though, in spite of myself. The creature has got no sense, but his vaporings sound strangely plausible sometimes.

In due time we arrived at the port of entry once more.

MARK TWAIN.

THE ENCHANTED ISLE.

THERE'S a magical island in time's troubled sea,
Where the softest of breezes are blowing,
And the mild zephyrs dance o'er the lily-crowned lea,
Keeping time to the rhyme of the rill's silver glee,
As it laughs over pebbles in flowing.
Blooming in beauty, bright amaranths there
Their sweet vernal fragrance e'er bring;
And birds, with plumage surpassingly fair,
Trill out their rich notes on the tropical air,
With a free, joyous, musical ring.

There are evergreen groves in that fairy-land,
Where echoes enchanting are heard;
Waked, by naiads that sport on the golden strand,
From harp-strings tuned by an unknown hand,
More charming than streamlet or bird.
Then talk not of Araby's spice-scented gales,
Nor of India's rose-hung bowers,
Nor of Killarney's moss-grown dales,
Nor the bright red fruit in its fertile vales,
Nor Italia's sunny hours;

But come, wander with me on this magical isle,
The beautiful paths along;
Come, sit in its roseate bowers awhile,
'Neath the 'wildering light of the floweret's smile,
That gladdens all the enchanted isle—
The magical Isle of Song.

"ALLIGATORS" IN ENGLAND.

"ALLIGATORS in England! Come, come, major, is not that just a little too—eh?"

"Well," cried the major, throwing himself leisurely back, and taking a long puff at his cigar, "I would tell you all about it, but that the telling would involve something of a story which might not, perhaps——"

But he was interrupted by a chorus of voices, "A story! What! a story!" "The very thing our ears are all thirsting for."

"Well," said the major, "when I was some twenty years nearer to the beginning of all things than I am at this present" (here followed a lengthy puff), "I was staying at the house of an old friend of my father's, in one of the northern counties of England. The squire himself, our host, was advanced in years, and we saw little of him, save at those times when the master of the house is expected to stand somewhat prominent in doing its honors. The greater share, however, even of this kindly duty devolved upon his heir, his only son, a fair average specimen of his class, gentlemanly, well-informed, rather retiring in disposition; and, I often thought, more likely, if left to himself, to shut himself up in his studio or laboratory for the instruction and benefit of mankind than to interest himself actively in the rough-and-tumble of life. He was not, however, without an occasional stimulus from his father, who as the representative of an ancient and well endowed family, deemed it incumbent upon himself and his heir, amongst other duties by no means neglected, to extend the hand of good-fellowship to his neighbors, and of hospitality to every deserving individual (ahem!) who came within the quiet sphere of his influence.

"Thus comfortably and satisfactorily things went on with us, till the near approach of a day of considerable importance to the family of our worthy entertainer: nothing less, in short, than the marriage of his heir to the daughter of a neighboring proprietor; a match in every way suitable and full of promise for coming generations of Westertons, for such is the name we will now know them by.

"The family estate was strictly entailed, and, in case of the death of the younger Westerton, would go to a distant cousin, then in the army and on duty in India. The old gentleman had, in his youth, suffered some rather severe love disappointment, and was long supposed to have taken an irrevocable vow against any further dealings with the traitorous sex; during this period it was that he had his nephew and heir to live with him: and the young man, seeing the fact of heirship reflected on every side, naturally came to look upon his ultimate accession to the property as almost a thing of course, and when his uncle 'shook off the dew-drops from his mane,' and provided himself with a wife, and, in due time, a direct heir to the estate, felt no doubt a deep amount of chagrin and disappointment. He had, however, no after-reason to complain, for his advancement in life was as carefully looked to as if he had been a younger son; which, I take it, is all that, under the circumstances, could reasonably be expected. There was not much cordiality, I fear, but a certain amount of all-very-well sort of intercourse kept up between them, their relative positions being well understood and appreciated on both sides.

"There was some troublesome war or other on hand just at the time I speak of, and we were accustomed to look over the news of the day with the sort of interest one is expected to take in the relatives of one's host—a kind of lazy curiosity to know whether they are going to be made field-marshals, or, in American phrase, had already 'gone under'—when we were startled by the arrival, totally unexpected, of our cousin himself. Ill-health formed the plea for his arrival in England; the contemplated marriage, heard of on his landing, for his presence in the north.

"He did not come alone. A wonderful collection of Oriental curiosities accompanied him, from the wing of a butterfly to the handkerchief of a Thug; curiosities which were under the especial charge of a Hindoo retainer, Gholab, and a retainer's retainer, who, if they were not Thugs themselves, looked, I could not help thinking, eminently well qualified for the dignity. That he should have brought these worthies with him excited our surprise: but that he explained by informing us of their devoted attachment to himself, for some vital service rendered to them in India. I think it was the saving Gholab's life; but, whether from a tiger, a bullet, or the gallows, I will not undertake to say.

"Both Gholab and his master were much occupied about the museum of curiosities before mentioned. In truth, I think I never came upon the former but that he was rubbing, polishing, or in some way working upon some queer, uncouth-looking object or other. Once I came suddenly upon him in a plantation at some distance from the house, and, as my curiosity had always been somewhat excited on his account, I stood for some moments observing his labors before advancing upon him. You know what bangles are?"

"To be sure. Indian ornaments for the ancles."

"Just so. Well, our friend was busily engaged in altering and shaping what appeared to me to be an ornament of this description, adding to it a strong-clipping spring, and a link or two of chain. He started up when he became conscious of my vicinity, with a greater appearance of fright and more wildness of gesture than I deemed the occasion justified, though he was an Oriental, and we were in a plantation at a short distance from an English squire's hall; and in reply to my simple question of what he was about, uttered some unintelligible gutturals, and gesticulated in a manner meant possibly to be explanatory, but which had, to me, an appearance wonderfully resembling the passes of Her Presto, the conjuror, when especially bent upon a process of bamboozling.

"But this and many other small matters besides, which have since acquired significance, passed away from my mind—at least from the surface of it—to lodge themselves, however, in those mysterious receptacles where I do believe every atomic affection on our sensoria, at any time experienced, is indestructibly lying, and still capable of being made prominent, either by some mental magic beyond our research, or by some sympathetic and appropriate combination of external circumstances. We shook ourselves down with our new arrivals as best we might, and returned to our diversions, among which swimming must be reckoned one, especially with the younger portion of our party. I don't wonder at it, as there was a beautiful lake in the grounds, with smooth grassy margins along the rich meadows, and shallow enough to be safe to all, but winding off into some thick plantations on high ground, where it became of corresponding depth, and where several rocky islets broke its surface, and rendered it, if somewhat gloomy, exceedingly picturesque and solemnly beautiful. Young Westerton was an excellent swimmer, and especially delighted in the refreshing exercise, so much so that he would not unfrequently spend the greater part of a summer afternoon in and about the lake, striking off boldly from the more open parts, and revelling, like a very Triton, amongst the rocks and sunken trees of the deeper and less accessible portion. Sometimes he would lie passive on the surface of the water, floating almost motionless, or gently paddling hither and thither in the full enjoyment of youth, health, and vigor.

"In amusing contrast with young Westerton's love of the water was the extreme horror always manifested by the Hindoo Gholab, whenever he was compelled to approach its banks. Nothing less than the most positive orders of his master ever brought him near, and it was ludicrous to see the speed with which he hastened from its vicinity as soon as, having discharged his service, he received his master's permission to retreat. The latter accounted to us for this striking dislike by relating an incident which occurred in one of the Indian rivers near which Gholab's childhood was passed. He was one day, in company with another youth, paddling about in the stream, when suddenly a large alligator rose close upon them, seized his companion, and disappeared with him in his jaws. The shock was so great that the poor fellow, who was sincerely attached to the unlucky victim, never quite got over its effects, but retained the picture of that horrible incident in his memory, to be freshened and intensified by any combination of wood and water at all resembling the scene of the sad catastrophe, 'a wonderful resemblance to which,' said cousin Westerton, 'some parts of my uncle's domain do certainly exhibit.'

"We were now within a fortnight of the projected marriage, and I was one day out on a shooting expedition, when, happening to pass near the turnpike-road, I saw a gig rapidly approaching from the direction of the Hall, and soon heard myself hailed by Cousin Westerton. I felt that, under ordinary circumstances, he would hardly have taken the trouble to greet me, as we somehow had not grown to care much for each other. It was therefore with some curiosity that I went up to the gig, which he had drawn to the roadside, and in which he was standing in evident expectation of my approach.

"'I have stopped to say good-bye,' cried he, eyeing me keenly the while. 'I am called off by business of the very last importance, and should not be surprised if I find myself tossing on my outward voyage to India instead of dancing at my cousin's wedding. By the way, what o'clock is it? My watch has stopped. Can you give me the exact time? Very provoking, is it not? I mean having to leave just at this particular juncture. What jolly days of it you will have. Half-past twelve, you say. Thank you. My uncle quite sees the necessity for my going. Good sport, I hope. Which way do you return?'

"I pointed in a direction which was not towards the lake.

"Ha! I see; through the finest covers on the estate. Well, I must not detain you. Half-past twelve, you say. Good-bye, good-bye.'

"And so he broke off his almost soliloquy, which either the impatience of his horse or his own excited manner leading to repeated checks at the bridle, only to be balanced by compensating touches of the whip, had made a decidedly uncomfortable proceeding. He was soon out of sight, and I on my rounds.

"After a while I dismissed the keeper and his dogs, having determined to saunter quietly back alone. It was a lovely afternoon, with warm balmy breezes just fanning the trees and hedgerows into graceful animation. Westerton Hall, with its well-ordered gardens and plantations, stood in the distance, and I was just wishing for some bit of active life to give more human interest to the scene, when from its gates emerged a single horseman, who galloped not merely swiftly, but, as it seemed to me, frantically in the direction of the town. Of course I hastened at once to the Hall. A strange dread came over me, and my thoughts settled with involuntary tenacity on the agitated manner displayed by Cousin Westerton when I met him on the road; but he, I reasoned, could not have been cognizant of any unusual occurrence, or he would at least have informed me of it. Besides, might I not be needlessly alarmed? Not so, however, for when I reached the house I found that young Westerton had just been brought in dead—drowned, as it appeared, in the deepest part of the lake.

"No one had witnessed his death. His companions on this occasion, as had often been done before, left him when they saw him strike off into the wilder and more secluded parts, where none of them cared to follow, never doubting, however, that when tired of exercise and exploration, he would return as usual, and join their party when evening drew nigh. Before this, however, accident revealed the body to a keeper who happened to be passing. It had got entangled amongst some roots or branches, and, but that it was lying over one of these, it is probable that the discovery would not have been made so early, as, from being thus caught, as it were, it was prevented from sinking into the depths of the lake. Life was quite extinct.

"'At what hour,' I asked, 'did he leave the house?'

"'At one o'clock; after lunch-time.'

"'Where were the Hindoos?'

"'In their master's apartments, packing up and preparing to be gone.' One of the house-servants had seen them busily engaged in doing so; indeed, so fully were they occupied with their task, that they plainly showed him they wished his absence, and immediately after he left, locked their door, and so had kept it ever since. I went at once to the rooms, impelled by some shapeless suspicion, of what I scarcely knew. The door was now unlocked, and I went in to find them both eagerly engaged in the manner represented to me by the servant, and as, to all appearance, they had been ever since his visit. I left them to themselves, though I declare I think a shepherd's dog, who suspects, but is not quite certain that some vagabond curs have been worrying his master's sheep, and longs to fly at their throats, must feel very much as I did.

"An inquest was duly held. All the ordinary indications of death by drowning were of course exhibited, and there was nothing more, with the exception of certain bruises about the right ancle-joint, which might have been occasioned by striking against the rocks or stubs in the lake, though, as one of the jury casually observed, they presented a remarkably circular and band-like appearance. I was myself present, and a good deal struck at the time by the words. They escaped, however, without comment, and as I could not connect them in any way with anything leading to suspicion of foul play, nothing further was said, and the circumstances passed from my mind, to return, however, with terrible distinctness and meaning thereafter. A sudden seizure of cramp was taken as the cause of death, a verdict returned accordingly, and young Westerton, just about to step into the arena of active life, was laid stark and disfigured in the vault of his forefathers.

"If this were an ordinary tale I am narrating, I ought I suppose in this place to descant upon the dreadful shock, (though that for a while it certainly was) this sad event occasioned to the bereaved bride—to send her with dishevilled hair into the woods, or to find her lying lifeless at the foot of some frightful precipice. There rises, however, in my mind's eye the vision of a still comely dame, not without sundry olive-branches springing around her, which quite precludes the propriety of that usually orthodox termination. Not that his intended wife was heartless or unfeeling. No; whilst she mourned for him, she mourned for him sincerely; but time, with its alleviations, tempered, though it might obliterate, the smart, and his remembrance faded into one of those gentle sorrows which we must of necessity cause to stand apart from those active duties life still brings with it. As to the heart-struck and hopeless old father, let us draw over him the veil of deep and silent sympathy.

"More than two years now passed away, and I was on the banks of the burning Ganges. My duties carried me to one of the lesser towns on the river, where time soon began to hang rather heavily on my hands. Occasionally I would, out of the merest idleness, turn into the court of justice there, but was seldom rewarded in my quest of adventure by anything more than the most petty illustrations of the doings of the Indian Themis. At last there came a change, and of so startling a character, that neither during the remainder of my sojourn there, nor for a long time after, had I anything to complain of in the way of listlessness or apathy. It chanced that I one day entered the court-house at one door just as a mixed group of guards and offenders were leaving it by another. I had just time to recognise amongst them the, to me, unmistakable features of the Hindoo Gholab, but whether there as a custodian or infractor of the laws I was then unable to make out. It mattered little, however, as I knew where to obtain easy and certain information of any and every thing connected with the administration of justice. On my return to my quarters, I found that the very men whom I wished to meet with were there, and were then discussing with some brother officers the details of a crime of an extraordinary nature, which had just come to light in that district. Several Hindoo girls had suddenly and mysteriously disappeared under the waters when performing their ablutious in the sacred stream, drawn under and devoured by alligators. Such was the general belief, until the body of one of them chanced to be picked up lower down the river, totally unmutilated, and deprived of certain valuable ornaments, which the young devotee was known to have had on when she went in. For a good while justice was completely at fault, but these ornaments having been traced to the possession of two men, over whose doings the strictest watch was preserved, the result was, that they were apprehended in a covered boat moored in the centre of the stream, almost in the act of despoiling one of their victims. It was supposed that a skillful diver, watching the opportunity of one being separated from the rest, rose through the waters, fixed a strong ligature to one of the lower limbs, and then dived off, whilst a confederate in a boat, by means of a rope and a hold or purchase of some kind at the bottom of the river, drew the struggling swimmer irresistibly down, when death soon put an end to all efforts to escape.

"Whilst these particulars were being narrated I became more and more agitated, until I could no longer keep my seat. 'Why, major,' said one, 'you seem disturbed; can there be anything in the doings of these wretches of sufficient pungency to quicken—'

"'Stop,' said I, for I saw he was about to quiz my equanimity, 'don't treat this matter lightly. I confess I am not a little agitated or a little confused at present, but—I have heard all you say, and, what is more, I have seen——'

"'What have you seen?'

"'I have seen the face of a man whom I never thought, and certainly never desired, to meet again.'

"'Of whom do you speak?'

"'Gholab.'

"'Why, that is the name of one of the villians accused as I have just informed you."

"'Great Heavens!' I exclaimed; 'but no, no, it is impossible; he could not approach a running stream, much less—and here, here, of all places; his dread of water, his pitiable shrinking away from its vicinity——'

"Something very like a burst of laughter from all assembled in the room here greeted me.

"'My good major, dread of water! Pitiable shrinking away from its vicinity! Why, this fellow Gholab is one of the most (if not the most) daring, skillful, and enduring divers of the East.'

"In a fever of agitation I demanded to be shown the remains of the latest victim. I was taken to where they lay. The attendants were about to disrobe the upper part of the body, but I pointed to the feet, and bade them uncover it there. They lifted the mat with which it was concealed, and there, round the slender ancle, was the circular band-like mark, the exact counterpart of that which I had beheld long before, when the happy home of one of my dearest friends was turned into a house of bitterest mourning.

"Unknown to the accused, I was present at the trial. Gholab—the other was hardly a sane being—in turn accused the alligators, many of which monsters infested the stream, and vociferously protested his own innocence, even when the bangle-like fetter, chain, and rope, which had been the instruments of murder, and which, as well as the ornaments of the poor victim, had been traced to his possession, were laid on the table before him. When these things were produced, I came from my station somewhat in the rear of the accused, advanced toward the table, keeping my face averted from them, and then taking up the chain and fetter, turned slowly round and confronted them with the evidences of guilt in my hand. For a few seconds the gaze of Gholab, though piercing and intense to the last degree, was evidently more of wonder than alarm; but suddenly recognition shot into his brain, and may I never again behold such terror and despair in the depths of a human soul (for in his glowing eyeballs it seemed all unveiled) as were then opened up like a vision into Hades before me. He stood rigid, immovable, and when the trial went on spoke never a word again, though so fiercely animated before. Still the trial went on, and the Judge was about to pronounce sentence of death, when, starting suddenly from his seeming trance, Gholab threw up his arms, and with a wild cry, fell back in a fit of horrible convulsions. The unspoken sentence of a Judge more potent had not only gone forth, but had been executed too; the man was dead——"

"And you think the circular abrasions round the ankle of young Westerton were——"

"The marks of that 'alligator's' teeth."

"And what became of the other—the cousin?"

"He did not live even to inherit. The old squire dragged on a broken life for some time, evincing little interest in anything, and rarely showing himself beyond his own doors, never beyond his grounds. One day, however, he seemed suddenly to have formed a strange resolution, which was neither more nor less than to drain the lake; he summoned a large body of laborers, and set them to work to perform the almost impracticable task. His nephew, who had not been near the spot since the catastrophe which restored him to his old position of heir to the Westerton estates, as soon as he heard of the old man's doings, urged either by apprehended damage to the property, or by apprehensions of a far more formidable character—namely, lest something might be revealed—hastened down at once to use his influence with his uncle to stop the work. As the old man could not be prevailed on to consent to do so, steadily refusing, at last, to utter even a single word on the subject to his nephew; in fear and rage the latter hurried to the workmen, and ordered them to desist. The foreman, however, having heard how matters stood, refused to stop without the direct orders of the Squire himself; a refusal which so enraged Westerton that he seized the man by the throat, and a personal altercation and struggle ensued, which ended in Westerton being thrown backward into the water. Of course he was quickly extricated, but through the neglect of proper precautions, a severe cold and fever ensued, which, passing through the stages of a delirium, in which he uttered words now best forgotten, finally led to his death. Who shall say whether retributive justice did not show itself in this. At all events, whoever they were who participated in the death of my friend, they are gone where the shortcomings of human justice are unknown, and, let us add, where the limits of human long-suffering and human mercy are far exceeded."

The Way to Do It.—A number of years ago, Charles H. and Clara S. were married in the city of New York. Charles was wealthy and in good business—very comfortable circumstances for a young man, which tended, of course, to develop his naturally liberal disposition. Feeling thus happy and independent of the world's frowns, he proposed to his youthful bride one day during the honeymoon, to give her five thousand dollars for every 'scion of his house' which should be engrafted upon the family tree—an arrangement, as may be supposed, to which the lovely Clara made not the slightest objection. Time passed on, Charles faithfully performing his agreement, and making no inquiries as to the disposition of his money by his better half, until they had been married some ten years; fortune, which had smiled with constancy, suddenly turned her back, and left him apparently high and dry, among the breakers of Wall street. When the crisis had arrived, he went home with a heavy heart to announce the sad news to his wife, that he was an irretrievably ruined man—that his property had all gone to satisfy his creditors, and nothing was left. 'Not exactly so bad as that, my dear, said Clar. 'Wait a minute and see what I have been doing.' Thus saying, she ran up stairs, and soon returned with a deed in her own name, of one-half of an elegant block of houses in the neighborhood, worth thirty thousand dollars. 'You see I have been industrious,' continued she, 'and have laid up something for a rainy day. If you had been as smart as your brother, we might have had the whole block by this time.'

Letting Apartments.—"You have no children, madam?" said a particular proprietor of a quiet house, before letting a lady the best apartments. "They are in the cemetery." A tear was attempted on the part of the landlord, the lease was signed, and the next day the lady arrived with a bundle of babes. "I thought your children were—were—in the cemetery?" "So they were, yesterday, sir, placing a few flowers on the grave of our former landlord, who was nervous, and to tell the truth, so irritable, that"—"I understand, madam—your children killed him."

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications:]

EVERY one who has been in the habit of listening much to the style of discussion on literary and art topics, which obtains in mixed society, will appreciate the following remarks on "Parlor Criticism," which we find in a recent number of the London Saturday Review:

"The appearance of a book, such as George Eliot's new novel, which is read by all the world, always affords an excellent opportunity of measuring the taste, judgment and discrimination of the people for whom books are supposed to be written. A novel by an eminent author calls forth an amount of unwritten criticism which illustrates the force and diversity of popular opinion on literary matters with more completeness than any other kind of composition. A man or woman with ever so mean an understanding and ever so small an int rest in things still feels perfectly competent to crown or condemn a novel. It is the same with paintings, and very nearly the same with music. History, philosophy, science, they sagaciously leave alone. These are delicate subjects for people who know nothing about them, because they can scarcely advance a step without making their ignorance conspicuous. But in what are called light subjects the case is different, and all art is looked upon as a light subject. With a vile affectation of humility, these critics of the parlor ostentatiously avow that they don't understand high art, and are entirely ignorant of grand critical principles: still they know what gives them pleasure, and they are not sure whether this, after all, is not as good a test as another of artistic success. This modest way of putting the case really veils a profound conviction that, though not learned in the pedantry of academics, they have a fine natural insight into the true and beautiful which is worth infinitely more than all that academies have got to teach. At bottom they sincerely believe that the pleasure which they derive from a book or a song or a picture is in truth the standard of its worth. And the giving of pleasure is unquestionably an end of all artistic composition Only it is worth remembering that everything depends on the sort of people to whom a piece is fit to give pleasure. The jovial song which fills with delirious transports the dull brain of a beery clown in an alehouse may not be very admirable in ears polite. And the young ladies, for example, who pass sentence so unflinchingly on novels, might perhaps usefully remember that neither the tears which the woes of a heroine can draw from them, nor the warm sympathy with which they at length see her united with a constant lover, can be taken for a conclusive proof that the novelist's work has been well done, any more than their falling asleep over the middle of the second volume is a proof that he has done his work ill. Too often they are as little able to appreciate the best and highest kind of fiction as the beery clown would be to appreciate one of Beethoven's sonatas or one of Mendelssohn's Lieder. The incapacity, which in the one case comes of beer and dullness combined, is in the other the simpler fruit of dullness and no beer."

We wonder if it has ever entered into the mind of any curious bibliographer, to ascertain the exact number of books that have been printed in the nature of commentaries or glosses upon the text of Shakspeare. Assuredly there have been enough of them to constitute of themselves a goodly library. And yet how few of the controverted points seem to have been definitively settled. It is still, for instance, a mooted question whether Hamlet was really mad, or only feigned madness, notwithstanding the hundreds of essays on the subject that have been written.

In a recent book, entitled Shakspeare's Delineations of Insanity, Imbecility, and Suicide, by A. O. Kellogg, at present physician of the State Lunatic Asylum at Utica, New York, the point is taken up once more, and argued in extenso, the doctor strenuously maintaining the theory of Hamlet's actual insanity. Of the attempts heretofore made to analyze the character of Hamlet, he seems to entertain but a slight opinion:

"Some of the most profound critics of the last century, and down to the present time, have in the play of Hamlet found an enigma which they have by no means been able to solve, and which has been to them a stumbling-block, and perpetual rock of offence. Schlegel, one of the most profound of German critics, who devoted some of the best years of his literary life to the study of Shakspeare, and who has poured upon the pages of our great dramatist the light of a most profound and philosophical criticism, and does more perhaps than any other man to give us a true conception of his powers, has not been able to analyze the character of Hamlet with anything approaching to psychological accuracy. In fact the idea of Hamlet as a genuine madman, seems never to have entered his mind, and hence his perplexity, and labored and unsuccessful efforts to unravel the mysteries and apparent contradictions he meets at every step, and the extraordinary manifestations of character which he finds in his hero."

The following will serve to furnish a general idea of the Doctor's line of argument. After enumerating the disturbing influences to which Hamlet was subjected, he proceeds:

"Here evidently are causes sufficient to induce insanity in minds far less susceptible to the invasion of the malady than that of Hamlet; and simply because early in the progress of the disease, he speaks of 'putting on an antic disposition,' we are not to suppose, in face of all the evidence which follows, that we have to deal with a case of feigned insanity, and that the poet has in producing the counterfeit, done more than he intended, and made the stamp so perfect, that he has been able to 'deceive the very elect' themselves. Upon other occasions, where the evidence of the poet's intention was quite palpable to all, and where he most certainly intended to produce a counterfeit, he has succeeded, as in everything he undertakes, and we have truly a counterfeit, such as needs no 'expert' to detect. Shakspeare, in the plenitude of his knowledge—a knowledge derived not from books and the accumulated experience of others, but from the closest observation of what he must have seen in actual life—recognized what none of his critics not conversant with medical psychology in its present advanced state, seem to have any conception of, namely, that there are cases of melancholic madness, of a delicate shade, in which the reasoning faculties, the intellect proper, so far from being overcome, or even disordered, may, on the other hand, be rendered more active and vigorous, while the will, the moral feelings, the sentiments and affections, are the faculties which seem alone to suffer from the stroke of disease. Such a case he has given us in the character of Hamlet, with a fidelity to nature which continues more and more to excite our wonder and astonishment, as our knowledge of this intricate subject advances. Within the last few years our knowledge of the various shades of insanity has been so much advanced that what we conceived to be the true view of the character of Hamlet appears now to be well established, and whether Shakspeare himself was conscious of what he was producing, matters little; the delineation is so true to nature that those who are at all acquainted with this intricate disease are fully convinced that Hamlet represents faithfully a phase of genuine melancholic madness. Whatever may have been the intention of Shakspeare, one thing is evident, he has succeeded in exhibiting, in the character of Hamlet, a complete revolution of all the faculties of the soul, by the overwhelming influence of the intense emotions excited in it; and whether the resulting condition of the mind be one of health or disease, sanity or insanity, (and the line of demarkation is by no means accurately defined,) the phenomena exhibited are, psychologically considered, of the most profound interest. We are convinced that the change wrought is so great, that the resulting condition of mind must, in the present state of our medico-psychological knowledge, be regarded as of a pathological character, and that Hamlet, with Lear and Ophelia, must be admitted into the ranks of that 'noble army of martyrs' to a mind diseased, too many of whom, alas! are found in the walks of everyday life. But we must by no means forget that the term 'mind diseased' does not necessarily imply a mind destroyed, or even a mind deranged in all its faculties, but one changed in its normal operations; a change which sometimes consists in a preternatural operation, or excessive activity of some of its nobler faculties, while others are more or less paralyzed."

It is a change of this kind, the author insists, that Shakspeare meant to exhibit in the character and conduct of Hamlet, as delineated in the play; and he devotes some twenty-five pages to the task of tracing this change, and analyzing the psychological phenomena developed during the course of it. He considers that the appearance of his father's spirit was the turning point in Hamlet's mental and moral career, and that the startling disclosures then made to him produced a disturbance and excitement under the strain of which his intellect gave way. In support of this theory, the Doctor contrasts the dignity, good sense, and courtly decorum of Hamlet's discourse and bearing up to the time of appearance, with the "wild and whirling words," as Horatio characterizes them, in which he thenceforth expresses himself. His manner of addressing the ghost whom he hears below when he is swearing his friends to secrecy, is particularly adverted to as differing most significantly from the tone of awe and reverential respect which had characterized his language in the earlier part of the same scene, and particularly in the sublime apostrophe commencing,

"Angels and ministers of grace defend us."

Our author sees something more than mock levity in such speeches as:

"Ha, ha, boy! say'st thou so? art thou there, true penny?
Come on—you hear this fellow in the cellarage—
Consent to swear."
"Hic et ubique! then we'll shift our ground."
"Well said, old mole! can'st work i' the ground so fast?
A worthy pioneer!"

This language, he thinks, betrays the wanderings of a mind affected by the first strokes of disease, rather than a healthy re-action from intense excitement.

In regard to the intimation conveyed by Hamlet himself in this scene, that he may hereafter think it "meet to put an antic disposition on" which is the chief basis of the theory of feigned madness, the Doctor suggests that it may "in the commotion of his mind have resulted as much from a vague consciousness of what was impending, as from any intention to act a part."

Our author seems at times inclined to claim for his views on this subject something more than the weight attached to a merely critical or literary authority. Nor is this to be considered unreasonable, though it is quite curious to observe with what complete seriousness and good faith he throughout argues his case precisely as if Hamlet were as genuine a historical character as Napoleon Bonaparte, and as if his acts and idiosyncrasies furnished just as legitimate material for psychological deductions. Can there be a more amazing proof of the exceptional power of Shakspeare's genius than the fact that the majority of his critics, including some of the greatest names in literature, have quite naturally, and almost unconsciously, as it were, fallen into the same habit in discussing his ideal creations?

Doctor Kellogg, indeed, talks about Hamlet in precisely as practical matter-of-fact a style as though he had him under lock and key in one of the wards of the Utica Asylum. He speaks quite pointedly of certain symptoms manifested by the patient, as being perfectly clear to the professional man, or the "expert" in lunacy, which he would nevertheless quite despair of making equally plain to "those critics who, having no practical knowledge of the more delicate shades of mental disease, quite mistake the character of Hamlet, regarding it like Schlegel as 'a riddle not easily solved,' or like Goethe, as 'an illustration of natural imbecility of will and purpose,' or, what is more, can only see with Dr. Johnson, in the 'pretended madness' of Hamlet, 'a cause of much mirth.'"

The interview between Hamlet and his mother in Act III, Scene 4th, where he expressly avers that he is not mad, only in "craft," and where he seems to talk with a most sane method, is summarily disposed of by our author. Hamlet's declaration, "It is not madness I have uttered, bring me to the test," has no weight with him, and he pronounces the test itself, though once considered infallible, as by no means a decisive one, and in its application to Hamlet's case, "quite worthless." He concedes that "to the non-professional reader" this scene furnishes strong evidence in support of the theory of feigned madness, but adds: "To us, however, he appears like a man who, being really and truly insane, has summoned all his powers for the accomplishment of his purposes, one of which, is to convince others that he is not mad. He can feign either sanity or insanity as best suited his purpose at the time."

Dr. Kellogg's argument, taken as a whole, is certainly both interesting and ingenious. But we doubt much if it will prove convincing to "the non-professional mind." Indeed, the probability is, that the question of Hamlet's madness will remain a vexed one as long as our literature endures.

Louis Napoleon is building a $5,000,000 Opera House in Paris, which will rival in extent and grandeur the Coliseum at Rome. It will cost about $5,000,000, and will be constructed entirely of stone, brick, and metal. Nothing combustible will enter into its composition. It will cover seven-and-a-half acres, and be two hundred feet in external height. The auditorium is calculated to seat only about three thousand persons. Every box will have its separate saloon attached, fitted up like drawing-rooms, and a carriage way will be constructed to the second story from the street. The most successful and celebrated artists of France—painters, sculptors and architects—will be employed in its ornamentation and erection. It will be entirely unapproachable in finish and richness by any structure at present existing.

Cobbett, when challenged to fight, recommended the challenger to draw a Cobbett in chalk upon a door, and if he succeeded in hitting it to send him instant word, in order that he might have an opportunity of acknowledging that had the true Cobbett been there, he, in all probability, would have been hit too. But hit or no hit, the bullets could have no effect on the original cause of the quarrel.

Ladies, by no possibility can you obtain so perfect a toilet article as Davidson's Circassian Bloom—fragrant, thoroughly harmless, and perfect in its imitation of nature. Use no other, and buy no other. Sold by all first class Druggists.

"Headache," "bilious," "stomach out of order," "food does not digest," etc For all such ailments, go to Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, before breakfast, (say from half-past seven to half-past eight o'clock,) and let him give you one of his water emetics, and if it does not give you new hopes and aspirations, and a conscious satisfaction that you have done well by yourself, nothing else can. It will be worth ten times all it will cost.

Who recommend the Knabe piano? The New York Tribune says: "Thalberg, after using the instruments, wrote: 'I find them equal, if not superior, to any in this country. Among the great qualities which distinguish them is the evenness of tone, the easy and agreeable touch, and the volume of tone.' Gottschalk, who tested them carefully a few months since, wrote: 'I cannot refrain from congratulating you on the important improvements you have introduced in the manufacture of pianos. Your instruments combine all the qualities which are required to make a piano as perfect as possible, and fully deserve the great popularity they have gained all over the country.' The Tribune adds: "These instruments are also approved by Strakosch, Anschutz, Gustave Sutter, Vieuxtemps, Mazio, Robert Heller, G. W. Morgan, and many other first-class artists. Erisbee & Scott, (Gustuve A.) No. 3 Montgomery street, are the sole agents in California for the Knabe piano, and have on hand some of the choicest and best-toned of these superior instruments. Be sure and see the Knabe piano before buying other instruments.

Steam Bathing having been scientifically adjusted to human necessities, by Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, is administered with the certainty of successful results in all cases, and have been verified in the instance of children from three years to youth, middle, and old age of more than seventy years; to fat, to lean, to tall, to short; for rheumatism, neuralgia, paralysis, fever and ague, dropsy, erysipelas, dyspepsia, Panama fever, colds, coughs, bronchitis, consumption, etc.; and Dr. Bourne understands his art so thoroughly, and is so eminently practical and in earnest in his profession, that all praise his institution and his happy method of curing the sick without medicine, blistering, bleeding, plastering, cutting, inflaming, etc. While baths are the foundation of his successes, he has many other aids, including electricity, which he was the first physician on this coast to introduce as a remedial aid, and has honorably employed it at least one hundred times to another's once during the whole period, and will continue its use in all cases in which it is not injurious. To "the million" it is furnished free, from six to nine o'clock P. M., Sundays excepted.

A NEW LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON.

AFTER THE MANNER OF M. ERNEST RENAN.

THE American, Washington, is not to be viewed by the savant as a mythical character. There are undoubtedly portions of his early history—traditions of his childhood—that savor of the fabulous. Such are the puerile legends concerning the hatchet and the cherry tree.

Nevertheless we must accept Washington as a real personage. It is the function of the "critical process" to sift the evidence, decide upon the authenticity of original documents, the credibility of witnesses, and in fine, to eliminate the solitary grain of history from the vast mass of its traditionary incrustations.

Undoubtedly Washington existed. Undoubtedly he was a very great man, and played a considerable part in the establishment of the independence of his country.

But alas! What fondness to speak of him as "The Father of his Country!"

This is sentimentalism; it is enthusiasm, though doubtless an amiable enthusiasm; nay, it is superstition. Yet let us concede something to a sublime weakness, to a loving ignorance; let us spare illusions in which so many tender but credulous souls find a measure of happiness. In a word, let us call it a harmless poetical superstition!

At first glance, the documents relative to the period of Washington would seem scanty and quite insufficient. As to Jared Sparks' eight or ten volumes, and Irving's huge duodecimo, and Bancroft, and a host of others—they possess no historic value whatever. All these are the products of a later age than that of Washington, and they leave an obscure interval upon which no light is thrown. They are synoptical compilations; compilations, too, from unknown or lost originals, of the credibility of which we have no means of judging.

But the most valuable documents for history, are those that possess in the least degree the historic form. Now these histories possess the historic form. Therefore they possess no value at all as historical compositions. Nothing can be more logical than this. Hence, if we accept Washington, as delineated in these histories, we must accept him by faith, not by criticism or philosophy. He cannot be scientifically demoustrated; he cannot be reached by any purely critical process.

Yet it is doubtless good for the Americans to believe in him. And certainly he is a great ideal creation; a glorious possibility of humanity. Why then impair the delightful illusion? Let us leave the Americans in the full enjoyment of their Washington. Poor souls! it does them good. We cannot all be savants.

For the first principle of the critical school is the allowance in matters of historic belief, not merely of what is true, (which is of little consequence to the philosophical mind), but of what is needed—the adaptation of beliefs to individual wants.

If, then, the popular ideal Washington is adapted to the wants of the American mind, in the name of Heaven let them hold fast their ideal. If not true philosophically, it is true for them.

For myself, I shudder at the thought of striving to attract to my way of thinking a solitary soul contented in its belief; the idea is hateful. I prefer to sit in serene liberty in the simple and joyous contemplation of the universe. It is therefore that I have written this book showing the folly of believing in Washington. Here, too, is logic.

The polemic system is not suited to my taste. I detest disputation. Men deficient in erudition may suffice for that. I, who am before all things a savant, aspire to the loftier role of a "critical" historian. If I am not critical, I am nothing.

Yes, it is for us, who possess a love of the true, and an inquiring spirit, to do something better than to dispute. Let us, of the higher and serener order of intellect, guard against a vain ardor. Let us pardon intolerance in opponents—let us even pardon egotism.

If, then, it is asked, "Did the man Washington live?" I answer unhesitatingly, "He lived." If it is asked, Did the American ideal Washington, who "never told a lie," the Father of his Country, the grand poetic figure embalmed in legend and tradition—did this Washington live? I answer unhesitatingly, He did not. This ideal Washington, this noble and sublime image, this touching and pathetic simulacrum, was "created" by the tender and loving imaginations, the patriotic instincts of his countrymen.

Yet peace in the name of God! Let the different orders of minds live side by side, each holding his own opinion. For is not one opinion as good as another to the philosopher? Let stupidity and mediocrity believe in their ideal Washington, and let us who are wise laugh at them—but serenely, always serenely, remembering that the true harmony of humanity results from the free use of discordant notes.

Yet, upon the whole, this belief, though foolish, is rather a good thing. Let us beware that we are not accomplices in destroying it. Doubtless the sum total of patriotism in the world, and especially in America, would be diminished by impairing it. Our disagreement with the asses who believe it, is purely scientific; we are with them at heart, and he who would rob them of their amiable reverence for their idol, is a moral monster.

To sum up, then, we find, paradoxical as it may appear to the uncritical mind, that the American Washington existed, and at the same time that he did not exist; that to believe in his existence is a sentimental weakness, and yet that such belief is the highest practical wisdom. For the foolish ones, who possess the capacity of belief, it is well to believe; for the philosopher, who cannot believe, unbelief is better.

In a word, it is a matter of indifference; but above all, let us be true to ourselves, let us do no violence to our convictions. Away with polemics! let us have no disputations!

POTSHERD GLIMMER.

AMUSEMENTS.

LADY DON closes her season of seven weeks at the Opera House with to-night's performance. It has been an extremely prosperous and profitable one—the most successful engagement, with the two exceptions of those of Forrest and the Keans, ever played in that theatre. Lady Don opened at the Opera House against the strong counter attraction of the Italian Opera season just inaugurated at the Metropolitan, and at once achieved great popularity with both the press and the public, and has continued to draw full houses all through her engagement, which is only relinquished in consequence of binding Celest-ial contracts on the part of the management. The pieces produced alternated between musical dramas, comediettas extravaganzas and burlesques; interspersed with ballads, popular songs and operatic gems—the musical plums of the popular pudding that Lady Don served up so well. The Lady has been extremely fortunate in being so well supported, especially by the subtile, natural and graceful Denin, the versatile Jackson and Courtaine, and the musical Barry—the season being distinguished by his debut in tenor parts. The light and entertaining character of Lady Don's pieces justly entitled them to be classed under the name of "amusements," and have certainly added greatly to the success of that lady's engagement.

Last night was set aside for Lady Don's benefit. As we went to press every seat was occupied, the lobbies and passage ways crammed, and even the steps and doorways preempted.

For this afternoon and evening the bill of last night will be repeated—Don Cæsar and Perseus and Andromeda—for the last appearances of Lady Don.

On Monday Madame Celeste, the famous pantomimic and melodramatic actress, in praise of whom so much has been written, will commence an engagement at the Opera House, appearing in the Woman in Red, which is almost identical in its plot and incidents with Camea. This play has been in preparation for several weeks past and will be produced with new scenery, dresses, etc., at an expense of three thousand dollars. Among the other pieces in which Madame Celeste is so great may be mentioned the House on the Bridge, Satan in Paris, French Spy, Green Bushes, and Flowers of the Forest.

ALICE KINGSBURY.—This young artiste, who has won an enviable reputation in her line of acting at the East, arrived in this city by the last steamer. We hear that she will appear at the Opera House upon the termination of Mme. Celeste's engagement. She is said to possess a remarkably pure and suave voice, and great originality of style. Unless the Sun is an arrant flatterer, she is also endowed with rare personal attractions.

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.—The performance of Ernani, on Friday of last week—put on the stage in an emergency and without preparation—deserves to be recorded as the most successful of the whole season, if delight and enthusiasm among the audience are any measure of success. Those who staid away because "they had heard Ernani before," certainly missed a glorious treat; but the absence of this sort of opera-goers is not (except financially) a subject of regret either to the management or to the really music-loving public. It is worthy of remark that the best performances by this troupe have been given to thin houses, and generally with but hasty and inadequate preparation—perhaps, as in this instance, to fill a sudden and unexpected vacancy. But the spirit of the artists, and the enthusiasm of a sympathetic and appreciative audience, re-acting on each other, combine to make the evening's experience, spite of petty drawbacks, one of real service to the cause of Music, and one which neither actor nor listener would willingly forget. We shall not criticise in detail the performance of Ernani, except to mention the accomplishment of a tour de force by Signor Mancusi, who took the high A flat, (as on a previous representation of the opera,) with electrical effect. On Saturday evening, for Mancusi's benefit, Crispino e la Comare, one act from Colomello, and a scene from Lucrezia Borgia, were given to a well filled house.

Don Giovanni, twice unavoidably postponed, was finally produced on Thursday evening, to a crowded and fashionable audience, and closed the second season of twelve nights. Not having witnessed the whole performance, we defer until another opportunity any particular notice of its merits.

Signor Milleri presented Norma, and selections from Il Barbiere and the Huguenots, for his benefit last night, which was deservedly successful.

The third and last season of twelve nights will commence on Monday next, and should, for many reasons, be even more numerously attended than its predecessors. We are promised, as entire novelties, La Juive and Ione; while the old favorites, Rigoletto, Masnadieri, (which we remember was performed eight times by the Bianchis, Fellini, and Grossi, during 1863,) and Il Poliuto, will be revived for the first time by the present company. That these operas will be presented in unexceptionable style, the experience of the past two seasons gives us abundant guaranty.

The public—even the subscribers—have but little idea of the immense amount of labor and expense already incurred by the management, in producing fifteen different operas within the space of two months. Of thirty-four performances, (including twenty-four regular, eight extra and two benefits,) the record shows that Crispino e la Comare has occupied five nights; Norma, four; Ernani, Un Ballo, Lucia, and Faust, three each; Il Trovatore, Attila, Lucrezia, and Il Barbiere, two each; while La Traviata, Nabuco, (which was produced at great expense,) La Sonnambula, Belisario, and Don Giovanni, were given but once, to our fickle and exacting public. Verdi's compositions have attracted twelve audiences; those of Donizetti, six; of Belliui, five; Ricci Brothers, five; Gounod, three; Rossini, two; and Mozart, one.

That these complete works have been brought forward in rapid succession, handsomely mounted, generally well performed, and with scarcely an instance where the public have been disappointed, indicates an almost incredible amount of labor on the part of both artists and management. Having hitherto confined ourselves to brief remarks upon special points in the performances of each week, we take this opportunity to render the credit which appears (from before the curtain—for we neither know nor are known to any of the artists, nor do we aim to unite in our single person the characters of manager and critic) justly due to each of those who have contributed to the general success. Of the prima donna, Signorina Brambilla, we have not thought it necessary to say much, for her high qualities as an artist have long since made her an established favorite. Her voice, not powerful, but used with rare judgment, and always heard when a significant note requires it; her delicate and brilliant execution; her versatility as an actress, and her wonderful correctness and rapidity of study: all these combine to make her an invaluable prima donna in a troupe which can afford but one. Signora and Signor Bianchi are also too well known here to require extended comment on their efforts during the past season; suffice it to say that they always do th ir best, and never disappoint the public. The two new artists, Signor Mancusi and Signor Milleri, have surpassed expectation; each has his ardent admirers, and it would be difficult to say which has proved the greater favorite. In secondary parts, our resident artists have exerted themselves with unusual success. MM. Charles and Roncovieri deserve especial credit for their careful singing and acting; M'lle Louise Tourney has filled one or two roles well, and in others has only distinguished herself by not knowing her part, and requiring constant prompting, even, for instance, in the fifth performance of Crispino, when Signor Mancusi had to give her the cue for nearly every sentence. If her memory is naturally poor, hard study must amend it, or she will never succeed on the stage. Herr Schraubstadter, in his infrequent performances, has always done well; and in their assumption of minor characters, Mrs. Cameron, M. M. Guinde, Hennecart, and others deserve favorable mention. The chorus and orchestra, with which we have had too frequent occasion to find fault, has lately shown signs of improvement; we could still desire, just for once, to hear all the sixteen instruments in tune with each other. Mr. Herold, a thorough musician, has found himself obliged by ill health to resign the conductor's baton into the hands of Mr. Evans, who has already shown a singular aptitude for the position. The arrangement of the stage, and the taste and energy displayed in many noticeable details of management, (and doubtless also in overcoming a hundred obstacles of which the public see and hear nothing,) are to be credited, we believe, to Mr. Crowley, the indefatigable general manager; the scene painter, and the costumers, also deserve a large share of applause; while the courteous Mr. Birrell and his assistants have done their utmost to satisfy the subscribers and the public in regard to seats and other matters in front of the house.

Having sometimes felt obliged to criticise severely the shortcomings of both artists and management in particular performances, we take the greater pleasure in this general acknowledgement of their success, and in the expression of our belief that the new season, to commence with Don Giovanni on Monday, will be the most attractive and satisfactory ever given on this coast.

Signorina Brambilla will present Il Barbiere for her first benefit, on Wednesday evening next, and will doubtless be greeted by a host of friends and admirers. On Friday, the third night of the season, La Juive will be produced, for the first time in San Francisco.

THE W D WOMAN OF SONGI.

TALE "CASPAR HAUSER."

ONE day in month of September, 1731, a singular being ente the little village of Songi, in France. The appearance pre l by this creature was that of a female child of about t ars old, scantily clad in rags, and with a skin of very da , nearly approaching to black. She was armed with a s hick club, having a heavy knot upon one end of it; and rified the simple people of the place at her sudden ap e among them, that they ran away and hid themselves ied that "the devil had come to Songi." By-and-by som m plucked up courage to approach within some distanc creature, who seemed by her gestures to be seeking f to drink. Then some cruel butcher with a spiked collar, at her; but just as the animal wa ging at her throat, she poised her club with both han d striking him with it on the head, laid him dead at her Frantic with savage exultation, she then danced a c around the body of her dead foe; after which sh iftly away to the woods, and climbed into a tree.

There was a nse excitement at Songi after this event. The lord of the r. M. le Comte d'Epinoy, heard about it, and gave instru to his head shepherd to make every exertion to captur strange visitant. Some person who had an idea of the w which monkeys are sometimes captured, proposed that a of water should be left near the foot of the tree, to ind creature, who appeared to be suffering from thirst, to d. This was done, and she deseended and drank, la the water like a beast; but before the watchers could her, she again ascended the tree, with wonderful agilit hid herself among the branches. It was then suggested wild creatures are less alarmed at women and children th men; so a woman and a couple of children were sent hc wood, carrying some fish as a bait to the wild girl, w er a while, came down to them, and was captured by the herd and his assistants.

She allowed f to be taken to the kitchen of the chateau without m much resistance. On arriving there she was attracted nc fowls that were feeding in the yard; and, dashing in ng them with wild excitement, she soon captured one, mediately began to eat it, just as a fox might have do a hawk. They then offered her a rabbit, with the skin this she seized with avidity, tearing the raw flesh with th, which were very sharp, and sucking the blood. It marked by those present that her hands were unusually n proportion to her size, the thumbs being remarkably d muscular. This gave her great facility in climbing s, from limb to limb of which she would bound with the y of a squirrel.

By order of M Epinoy, the shepherd took charge of this singular creature He carried her to his home, where every effort was mad an her from her savage habits; but for a long time in Cooked meals she would not touch. Her only attem language were no more intelligible than the snarling of a animal; and, indeed, so little faith had the country her being human, that for a long time she was known among them as "the shepherd's beast." Although treated with the greatest kindness, she constantly tried to escape to the woods, digging her way, with her long nails, through wall and roof.

Once in a very severe winter, when the ground and trees were covered with snow, she succeeded in making her escape, and it was only after a long search that she was discovered in her favorite retreat—a tree top—and brought back.

Not long after her domiciliation with the shepherd, it was observed that her skin was gradually growing lighter in color, and, upon a close inspection of it, there was reason for supposing that it had been dyed. In time she learned a few words of the French language, and her repugnance to cooked victuals began to give way. The change in her mode of living soon began to tell upon her health, however, one of the first results of it being the loss of her teeth, which were eagerly sought after in the neighborhood as relics or charms. Her teeth grew again; but she never entirely recovered her health; and the doctor by whom she was attended prescribed for her an occasional allowance of raw victuals, for which she long continued to show a preference.

Raw fish was her favorite diet, and she would frequently plunge into ponds or rivers with all the confidence of a seal or otter, in pursuit of the finny tribe. More than once she was seen to emerge from the water with a carp in each hand: and then she would seat herself on the bank of the river, and tearing the fish to pieces with her teeth and nails, would devour it on the spot.

As soon as the intelligence of this unaccountable being began to be somewhat developed, M. d'Epinoy decided upon sending her to a neighboring convent. Here she was christened by the name of Memmie Le Blanc, and her education in time was so far advanced that she was able to speak and read French with tolerable facility. Her savage predilections, too, were entirely eradicated, and her manners gradually became those of a civilized being.

And now certain reminiscences of her early life seemed to dawn upon her mind. She would speak of a country where the people dwelt in caves dug in the ground, or in huts built in trees. She described a certain wild animal the size of a large dog, having a round head and very prominent eyes, and provided with fore-paws only, with which it would paddle about in the water in pursuit of fish. Then she had a shadowy remembrance of being taken to a ship, with a companion older than herself, and of the same dark hue. They were each armed with clubs, and had beside an instrument resembling a paddle, which was carried at the back. She related how, while voyaging in this ship, she and her companion made several efforts to escape by jumping overboard. Then they were placed in the hold of the ship for security; and here an unsuspected danger had nearly sealed the fate of the passengers, for the two little prisoners went to work, tooth and nail and had almost succeeded in making a hole through the bottom of the ship when they were fortunately discovered.

Her next remembrance after this was that she was on land somewhere, still with her companion. They kept through woods, living on such animals as they could kill, until they came to a large river, supposed, by the description she gave of it, to be the Marne. Into this she and her companion plunged, and remained in the water for a long while, where they caught several fish.

This, so far as could be ascertained, occurred only a few days before her appearance at Songi, and evidence was given by a person dwelling upon the banks of the Marne that about the time in question he had observed two creatures of dark color swimming and plunging about in the water. Supposing them to be wild acquatic creatures of some kind, he had gone in pursuit of them with his gun, and had even fired at them, though without effect, as he saw them emerge again from the water at a considerable distance away, after which he lost sight of them.

After this, Memmie used to say that she remembered how she and her companion landed on the bank opposite to the one from which they had entered the river. As they passed on through the country Memmie found a string of beads, which her companion tried to wrest from her by force. The elder girl was getting the better of her antagonist, when the latter struck her with her club, stunning her and cutting her head so as to "make it red," as she herself expressed it, in reference to the blood. Then she was frightened at what she had done, and running to a pond she caught a frog, and having skinned it she applied the skin to the temple of her wounded companion, who presently revived. After this they wandered on and on, until they got separated in some way or another, and Memmie could give no clear account of what happened to her from that time until she arrived at the village of Songi.

While at the convent, Memmie would sometimes recount to her companions experiences of her life while residing with M. d'Epinoy, who had taken her to his chateau some time after she had been domesticated in the family of his shepherd. Once, she said, there was a large party invited to a dejeuner at the chateau, and she was an object of much curiosity and interest to the guests. She could speak a little then, but had not yet got over her preference for raw food. Going among the guests she bantered them playfully for eating such victuals as was set before them, and begged them to restrain their appetites while she went away to procure some better viands for them. Then she ran off on her wonderfully swift feet, to a pond in the neighborhood, where she soon caught a number of frogs, placing which in her apron, she returned with them to the dining-room, and tumbled them out upon the table before the astonished guests. When the frogs tried to escape by leaping to the floor, she persisted in returning them to the table, and at last wound up the performance by swallowing several of them alive.

No trace was ever found of the companion described by Memmie as having been with her in her wanderings. The old French pamphlet from which we have gleaned the foregoing particulars was published during the lifetime of Memmie, and there is no record relating to her subsequent career. Her appearance at Songi and the circumstances connected with her history are facts, being substantiated in the pamphlet referred to, by extracts from several of the papers of the day. For the rest, all is vague surmise.

Some of the writers on the subject suppose her to have been taken from the coast of Labrador, and carried to Europe in a ship, from which she escaped in the manner described; and this theory would seem to hold good from her description of the seal. Against this, however, is to be placed the fact that she did not describe ice and snow, but spoke of people who dwelt in holes in the ground and in trees.

A more feasible theory broached about her was, that she had been taken from some Dutch, American, or African colony, and, belonging to a tribe of light complexion, had been dyed so as to make her saleable as a negro slave. Some Dutch skipper might have purchased her and her companion for exhibition, and taken them to some port in Holland, whence they had made their escape, a thing which might have been possible a century ago, before the era of railroad, of telegraph, and police. At any rate, her story is a curious one, and one cannot help wishing to know what finally became of poor Memmie Le Blanc, and of the companion who accompanied her for a while her wild wanderings.

THE KANSAS YANKEE'S FERRY TICKET.—You know the test to which the Missourians subject all travellers who made their appearance at any of their ferries, and ask to be crossed over to Kansas. Some years since a slab-sided Yankee arrived at one of the Missouri landings, with a long train of "plunder" of various sorts. By way of testing him, the ferryman asked him what stock he had.

"Waal," says the Yankee, "I've got two horses, a yoke of oxen, and two 'keows.'"

"That's enough," replied the ferryman; "you can't cross here."

"Why not?" inquired the Yankee.

The ferryman told him that his instructions were not to cross anybody who couldn't pronounce the word cow.

"But I said 'keow,' persisted the Yankee.

"Well, you can't cross here," rather gruffly replied Charon.

"But I've got tickets entitling me to cross," urged the Yankee.

The ferryman replied that he did not know of anybody who had a right to sell him tickets.

"But I've got them anyway."

The ferryman demanded a sight of the tickets, whereupon Mr. Yankee stepped back a little, hauled out a revolver in each hand, crying, "Them's the tickets, and I'm bound to cross this ferry 'keow' or no 'keow!'"

EDMUND BURKE'S IDEA OF A PERFECT WIFE.—She is handsome, but it is not a beauty arising from the features, from complexion, or shape. She has all three in a high degree, but it is not by these that she touches the heart—it is all that sweetness of temper, benevolence, innocence and sensibility which a face can express, that forms her beauty. She has a face that just arouses your attention at first sight; it grows upon you at every moment, and you wonder it did not more than raise attention at first. Her eyes have a mild light, but they awe when she pleases; they command, like a good man out of office, not by authority, but by virtue. Her stature is not tall, she is not made to be the admiration of every one, but the happiness of one. She has the firmness that does not exclude delicacy—all of the softness that does not imply weakness. Her voice is soft, low music, not formed to rule in public assemblies, but to charm those who can distinguish a company from a crowd; it has it advantage, you must come close to hear it. To describe her body, describe her mind—one is the transcript of the other. Her understanding is not shown in the variety of matter it exerts upon, but the goodness of the choice she makes. Her politeness flows rather from a natural disposition to oblige, than any rules on that subject, and therefore never fails to strike those who understand good breeding and those who do not.

BOZALDAB'S VISION.

AN EASTERN TALE.

Conduct me, thou of being cause divine,
Where'er I'm destin'd in thy great design!
Active, I follow on; for should my will Resist, I m impious; but must follow still.

BOZALDAB, Caliph of Egypt, had dwelt securely for many years in the silken pavilions of pleasure, and had every morning annointed his head with the oil of gladness, when his only son Aboram, for whom he had crowded his treasuries with gold, extended his dominions with conquests, and secured them with impregnable fortresses, was suddenly wounded, while hunting, with an arrow from an unknown hand, and expired in the field.

Bozaldab, in the distraction of grief and despair, refused to return to his palace, and retired to the gloomiest grotto in the neighboring mountain; he there rolled himself on the dust, tore away the hairs of his hoary beard, and dashed the cup of consolation that Patience offered him to the ground. He suffered not his ministrels to approach his presence; but listened to the screams of the melancholy birds of midnight, that flirt through the solitary vaults and echoing chambers of the Pyramids. "Can that God be benevolent," he cried, "who thus wounds the soul, as from an ambush, with unexpected sorrows, and crushes his creatures with irremediable calamity. Ye lying imans, prate to us no more of the justice and the kindness of an all-directing and all-loving Providence! He whom you pretend reigns in Heaven, is so far from protecting the miserable sons of men, that he perpetually delights to blast the sweetest flowerets in the garden of Hope; and like a malignant giant, to beat down the strongest towers of Happiness with the iron mace of his anger. If this Being possessed the goodness and the power with which flattering priests have invested him, he would doubtless be inclined and enabled to banish those evils which render the world a dungeon of distress, a vale of vanity and woe. I will continue in it no longer.

At that moment he suddenly raised his hand, which Despair had armed with a dagger, to strike deep into his bosom; when suddenly, thick flashes of lightning shot through the cavern, and a being of more than human beauty and magnitude, arrayed in azure robes, and crowned with amaranth, and waving a branch of palm in his right hand, arrested the arm of the trembling and astonished Caliph, and said with a majestic smile—"Follow me to the top of this mountain."

"Look from hence," said the awful conductor; "I am Caloc, the angel of Peace. Look from hence into the valley."

Bozaldab opened his eyes and beheld a barren, a sultry, and solitary island, in the midst of which sat a pale, meagre, and ghastly figure; it was a merchant just perishing from famine, and lamenting that he could find neither wild berries nor a single spring in that forlorn uninhabited desert; and begging the protection of heaven against the tigers that would now certainly destroy him, since he had consumed the last fuel he had collected to make nightly fires to affright them. He then cast a casket of jewels on the sand, as trifles of no use, and crept, feeble and trembling, to an eminence, where he was accustomed to sit every evening to watch the setting sun, and to give a signal to any ship that might haply approach the island.

"Inhabitant of heaven," exclaimed Bozaldab, suffer not this wretch to perish by the fury of wild beasts." "Peace," said the angel, "and observe."

He looked again, and behold a vessel arrived at the desolate isle. What words can paint the rapture of the starving merchant, when the captain offered to transport him to his native country if he would reward him with half the jewels of his casket? No sooner had this pitiless commander received the stipulated sum than he held a consultation with his crew and they agreed to seize the remaining jewels, and leave the unhappy exile in the same helpless and lamentable condition in which they discovered him. He wept and trembled, entreated and implored in vain.

"Will Heaven permit such injustice to be practiced?" exclaimed Bozaldab. "Look again," said the angel, "and behold the very ship in which, short sighted as thou art, thou wishedst the merchant might embark, dashed in pieces on a rock; dost thou not hear the cries of the sinking sailors? Presume not to direct the Governor of the Universe in his disposal of events. The man whom thou hast pitied shall be taken from this dreary solitude, but not by the method thou wouldst prescribe. His vice was avarice, by which he became not only abominable, but wretched; he fancied some mighty charm in wealth, which, like the wand of Abdiel, would gratify every wish, and obviate every fear. This wealth he has now been taught not only to despise but abhor; he cast his jewels upon the sand, and confessed them to be useless; he offered part of them to the mariners, and perceived them to be precious; he has now learnt that they are rendered useful or vain, good or evil, only by the situation and temper of the possessor. Happy is he whom distress has taught wisdom! But turn thine eyes to another and more interesting scene."

The Caliph instantly beheld a magnificent palace, adorned with the statues of his ancestors wrought in jasper; the ivory doors of which, turning on hinges of the gold of Golconda, discovered a throne of diamonds, surrounded with the Rajas of fifty nations, and with ambassadors in various habits, and of different complexions; on which sat Aboram, the much lamented son of Bozaldab, and by his side a princess fairer than a Houri.

"Gracious Allah! It is my son," cried the Caliph—"O let me hold him to my heart!" "Thou canst not grasp an unsubstantial vision," replied the Angel. "I am now showing thee what would have been the destiny of thy son, had he continued longer on earth." And why, returned Bozaldab, "was he not permitted to continue? Why was I not suffered to be a witness of so much felicity and power?"—"Consider the sequel," replied he that dwells in the fifth heaven. Bozaldab looked earnestly, and saw the countenance of his son, on which he had been used to behold the placid smile of simplicity and the vivid blushes of health, now distorted with rage, and now fixed in the insensibility of drunkenness; it was again animated with disdain, it became pale with apprehension, and appeared to be withered by intemperance, his hands were stained with blood, and trembled by turns with fury and terror; the palace so lately shining with oriental pomp, changed suddenly into the cell of a dungeon, where his son lay stretched out on the cold pavement, gagged and bound, with his eyes put out. Soon after he perceived the favorite sultana, who before was seated by his side, enter with a bowl of poison, which she forced Aboram to drink, and afterwards married the successor to his throne.

"Happy," said Caloc, "is he whom Providence has by the angel of death snatched from guilt! from whom that power is withheld, which, if he possessed would have accumulated upon himself yet greater misery than it could bring upon others."

"It is enough," cried Bozaldab; I adore the inscrutable schemes of Omniscience! From what dreadful evils has my son been rescued by a death, which I rashly bewailed as unfortunate and premature; a death of innocence and peace, which has blessed his memory upon earth, and transmitted his spirit to the skies.

"Cast away the danger," replied the heavenly messenger, "which thou wast preparing to plunge into thy own heart. Exchange complaint for silence, and doubt for adoration. Can a mortal look down, without giddiness and stupefaction, into the vast abyss of Eternal Wisdom? Can a mind that sees not infinitely, perfectly comprehend anything among an infinity of objects mutually relative? Can the channels which thou commandest to be cut to receive the inundations of the Nile, contain the waters of the Ocean? Remember, that perfect happiness cannot be conferred on a creature; for perfect happiness is an attribute as incommunicable as perfect power and eternity."

The Angel, while he was speaking thus, stretched out his pinions to fly back to the Empyreum; and the flutter of his wings was like the rushing of a cataract.

THE CALIFORNIA ALPS.—The following are approximate altitudes and latitudes of some of the chief peaks of the South Sierra Nevadas:

This region which was first explored, and its great height ascertained by the State Geological Survey, will, in future years be resorted to by numerous visitors, every summer. The scenery far exceeds the European Alps, in grand and varied character.

ORIGIN OF ILLUSTRIOUS MEN.—Columbus was the son of a weaver, and a weaver himself.

Claude Lorraine was bred a pastry cook.

Cervantes was a common soldier.

Homer was the son of a small farmer.

Molière was the son of a tapestry maker.

Demosthenes was the son of a cutler.

Terrence was a slave.

Oliver Cromwell was the son of a London brewer.

Howard was an apprentice to a grocer.

Franklin was a journeyman printer, and son of a tallow chandler and soap boiler.

Daniel Defoe was a hostler, and son of a butcher.

A PRUSSIAN SENTINEL.—A story is told of a Prussian sentinel stationed on the steeple at Troppau, and left behind there when his company retreated. The citizens attempted to take him prisoner; but the Prussian easily defended with his bayonet the narrow winding stair by which alone access could be gained to the steeple. They then decided on reducing him by famine; but the Prussian having with him a good supply of cartridges, announced, that, unless he was regularly and well fed, he would shoot every one who passed in the streets around the church. The good soldier thus contrived to maintain his position for two days, when Troppau was reoccupied by the Prussians, and he was relieved.

MONKEY TRICKS.

I LATELY had a little monkey, who was such a great thief, that if he had been a human being he would have been transported over and over again for numerous acts of petty larceny. I, however, turned his thieving propensities to good account. Master Jack (after I had had him some time) showed evident symptoms of phthisic or consumption, and I prescribed cod liver oil. It was placed openly before him on the dining-room table, but he refused it with symptoms of disgust and sundry tail shakings. I then poured a little into a saucer, and placed it in such a position that Master Jack should find it for himself, while I pretended to be reading and not to notice what was going on. The trap took; Jack, thinking he was stealing the oil, sucked up the prescribed dose, making a face not implying nausea, but rather high glee at his own cleverness.

This "deceit," however, was after a time discovered by the artful creature, and one day I found my friend with his long tail and arms tightly coiled round the table lamp, and stealing the colza oil as it dropped down from the wick. He managed to get one of his long, spider-leg-like fingers through the brass work of the lamp, and held it till a drop of oil fell on it; he then put it in his mouth and sucked off the oil like a child sucking sugar candy. How he could manage to gaze at the intense light, which one would have thought would have hurt his eyes when so near the lighted wick, I know not. I fancy, however, that the light bothered him somewhat, for he used to frown dreadfully while he was waiting for the oil to drop on his finger. I placed colza oil before him; no, he would not touch it; but nevertheless, he had no objection to it when he stole it for himself from the lamp. He was certainly better and fatter for his medicine, which was so sweet because stolen, and I really think it saved his life.

Jack, too, had a marvellous propensity for picking things to pieces, and smashing articles that came in his way; strange to say, he never tore a useless bit of paper or broke a common or valueless bit of goods. One day he sneaked out of his cage and had a good morning's work to himself, tearing off the leather and pulling out the lining of an old arm chair. He was, after an hour or two, discovered in the act, and taken into custody to be duly chastised for his mischief. He cried "murder" when he saw preparations made to punish him, but at the same time he held out his hand firmly closed upon something in it. His pickers and stealers were unclasped, and in the palm of his hand was discovered a half sovereign, which he had most certainly found and picked out of the chair, and which probably had been buried in the lining of the chair (an old second hand one) for years. His proffered ransom got him off his punishment, but his investigations into the structure of watches, books, ink and cruet stands, writing desks, MS. notes, etc., have not since produced equally valuable discoveries.

Nothing pleased Jack so much as to make his escape, Jack Sheppard fashion, from the wire cage in which he was kept by the kitchen fire. He would pick and pick with his long, skeleton-like fingers till he found the staple loose. If any body happened to look round at him while he was at work he would drop instantly on the hay and pretend to be asleep. When he managed to get the door unfastened he would not bolt out in a moment, but push it open as gently and gradually as a burglar. He would then sneak out, and the cunning rascal would carry his chain on his tail to prevent it rattling on the stones and the servant detecting his pranks. His object was to get to my room, and on looking up I frequently found my friend nestled inside the fender. He came into the room so quietly that I did not know that he had escaped from his cage till he called my attention by a friendly chatter, as much as to say—"I've got loose so cleverly that you really must not scold me for it."—Frank Buckland's Curiosities of Natural History.

IMPORTANCE OF RIGHT EMPHASIS.—A stranger from the country, observing one of Carpenter's Roller Counting-house Rules, lifted it, and, inquiring the object, was answered, "It is a rule for counting houses." Too well-bred, as he construed politeness, to ask unnecessary questions, he turned it over and over, and up and down repeatedly, and at last, in a paroxysm of baffled curiosity, inquired, "How in the name of nature do you count houses with this?" There is another good story on the subject of emphasis. "Boy," said a visitor at the house of a friend to his little son, "step over the way and see how old Mrs. Brown is." The boy did the errand, and on his return reported that Mrs. Brown did not know how old she was, and that she said he might find out by his own learning.

PUNCH slanderously says: "The sun is called masculine, from its supporting and sustaining the moon, and finding her the wherewithal to shine always as she does of a night, and from his being obliged to keep such a family of stars. The moon is feminine, because she is constantly changing, just like a ship blown about by every wind. The church is feminine, because she is married to the State; and Time is masculine, because he trifles with the ladies.

THE NEW ORLEANS MASSACRE.

NOW that we are in possession of all the official documents calculated to shed any light on the fearful tragedy of July 30th, we are in a position to speak of it intelligently, and without risk of being misled by partial information.

The documents referred to consist of the dispatches of Gen. Sheridan to Gen. Grant, the correspondence between Mayor Monroe of New Orleans, and Major-General Baird, commanding in the Department of Louisiana, and the report of the Grand Jury "of the Parish of Orleans."

All accounts agree in stating that the immediate cause of "the riot," as the Grand Jury are pleased to designate what seems upon the evidence to have been a preconcerted massacre, was the assemblage of a body of men "claiming to be members of the Convention of 1864, and also claiming the legal right to remodel the State Government."

Back of this immediate cause—which seems, however, to have been rather an occasion than a cause—Gen. Sheridan finds the real origin of the tragedy in "the antagonistic feeling" existing in the community between the Union men and the sympathizers with the rebellion.

The language in which Gen. Sheridan characterizes the affair is exceeding strong. He says: "The more information I obtain concerning it, the more revolting it becomes. It was no riot—it was an absolute massacre by the police it was a murder which the Mayor and police perpetrated without a shadow of necessity. Furthermore, I believe it was premeditated; and every indication points to this." Let us now endeavor to ascertain whether Gen. Sheridan had sufficient grounds for employing such language as this.

The "riot," as already stated, occurred on the 30th. On the 25th Mayor Monroe addressed a letter to Gen. Baird, mentioning the intended meeting of the Convention, and announcing his, the Mayor's, determination to "disperse" it as "an unlawful assembly, calculated to disturb the public peace and tranquillity." The Mayor concluded his communication with an inquiry which was its sole object; that inquiry was "whether the projected meeting" had Gen. Baird's "approbation;" in other words, the Mayor wanted to ascertain whether the Convention would be protected by the military authorities.

To this letter, the real significance and object of which Gen. Baird does not seem to have understood, that unsophisticated officer replied, stating that the "assemblage referred to" had not, so far as he was aware, "the approbation of any military authority for its meetings," and adding that he, the writer, "presumed the gentlemen composing the Convention" had never deemed it necessary to ask any permission or sanction for their proposed meeting from the "military authorities." The General further says, with refreshing simplicity: "When asked if I inteuded to furnish the Convention with a military guard, I have replied, no; the Mayor of the city and the police will amply protect its sitting!" Viewed in the light of subsequent events this delightful confidence in "the Mayor and the police" seems touching in the extreme. The General then proceeds to explain to the Mayor his theory in regard to the Convention. "If," he says, "the assemblage in question has the legal right to remodel the State Government, it should be protected in doing so; if it has not, then its labors must be looked upon simply as a harmless pleasantry to which no one ought to object." Moreover, the General "cannot understand how the Mayor of a city can undertake to decide so important and delicate a question as the legal authority upon which a Convention, claiming to represent the people of an entire State, bases its action."

Doubtless Gen. Baird imagined, after dispatching this epistle defining his own position and suggesting his view of the proposed Convention to Mayor Monroe, that all danger of any interference with that body on the part of the municipal authorities was at an end. Assuredly he could not have anticipated the possibility of what occurred a few days afterwards; otherwise he would not have refused to furnish the military guard asked by the Convention. Meantime Mayor Monroe had attained his purpose. He had learned that the Convention would be without military protection; he saw that Gen. Baird cherished the idea that no such protection would be needed, and that a simple intimation of his views would be sufficient to control the action of the authorities. We can imagine the sardonic smile with which the Mayor perused this rather complacent epistle as he revolved the surprise he was preparing for the unsuspecting General. The letter was dated and apparently received on the 26th, and the municipal officials had four days for organizing their plans. To do them justice, they appear to have made effective use of the time.

The eventful day, the 30th, arrived, and at about one o'clock P. M., according to Gen. Sheridan's statement, "a procession of from sixty to one hundred and twenty colored men" marched toward the Mechanics' Institute, where the Convention was to meet, carrying an American Flag. This would scarcely seem to have been a sufficiently formidable body to endanger the peace of the city. About "every tenth man," says Gen. Sheridan, "had a pistol." Surely it would have been easy for the authorities to have dispersed the procession or to have arrested all the individuals in it, without killing forty persons, had such been their real wish. "There were many spectators in the streets, and their manner and tone were unfriendly;"—we still quote Gen. Sheridan's statement—"a shot was fired, by whom I am unable to state." Under the circumstances, can there be any reasonable doubt as to whether the members of the small and almost unarmed procession, or the "unfriendly crowd" backed by the police, were the aggressors? A difficulty occurred at the door of the Institute, between a colored man and a policeman, and a shot was fired. Then followed "an indiscriminate fire on the building through the windows by the policemen." Then a white flag was displayed by those within, and the slaughter ceased for a moment—but only for a moment. The police rushed in and "opened an indiscriminate fire upon the audience until they had emptied their revolvers." Then they retired, apparently to procure a fresh supply of ammunition. Such, at any rate, seems to have been the belief of the survivors thus far of the massacre, for they proceeded to barricade the doors. But the police returned, the doors were broken open, and the firing recommenced. Those who escaped from the building were fired upon by a circle of policemen outside, and by the citizens. "The wounded were stabbed while lying on the ground, and their heads beaten with brickbats." But why dwell upon details? The real complexion of the affair cannot be disguised; it was a massacre. Possibly, the testimony upon which Gen. Sheridan based his official communication to Gen. Grant, may not have been accurate in all the details; but on all hands it is admitted that forty persons were killed outright, and some one hundred and sixty wounded. And of the forty persons murdered, all were either negroes or Unionists. None of the policemen or citizens engaged with them appear to have been killed. The slaughter was all on one side, showing that there was no effective resistance; that the assailed party were helpless, and that they might have been arrested without bloodshed had such been the plan of the authorities. But Mayor Monroe and his confederates had unquestionably resolved to make the Convention, which Gen. Baird in his simplicity had informed them "must be looked upon as a harmless pleasantry," a very grim and ogreish piece of "pleasantry," indeed, redolent of that peculiar vein of humor that crops out occasionally in the flaying of a negro alive, or the roasting of an Abolitionist. In the report of the Grand Jury on "the riot," we observe some fine touches of irony in quite an analogous vein, as for instance the passage where it is stated: "There seems to have been some unnecessary loss of life, and some unnecessary ferocity and brutality . . . but the police with a few exceptions behaved with humanity."

THE PALINDROME is a line that reads alike backward and forward. One of the best is Adam's salutatiou to Eve: "Madam, I'm Adam."

Another was uttered by Napoleon at St Helena, when asked if he thought he could have taken London: "Able was I ere I saw Elba."

The best are found in the Latin, as the lawyer's motto: "Si Nummi immunis," and the best is as follows: Sator, arepo tenet opera rotas." It is the same backward as forward; all the first letters of the words spell the first word; all the second letters of the words spell the second word, and so on through; and also backward the same.

The baker at Yreka who, years ago, very naturally called his establishment "Yreka Bakery," will doubtless be astonished to learn that he is a palindromist as good as Adam, and nearly equal to Napoleon.

WOMAN AT THE BALLOT-BOX.

WE are not about to enter into any discussion of the subject of Female Suffrage; our present purpose is simply to note the significant fact that, from being a fanciful and abstract question debated without serious reference to practical results, it has actually come to be regarded as one of the gravest political questions of the day. In England it is no longer left to the handling of theoretical essayists. Such men as John Stuart Mill have taken it up in the most sober and matter-of-fact spirit, insisting upon the justice and expediency of extending the suffrage to women; and several of the leading London journals have actually ceased to regard it as a theme susceptible only of humorous treatment, and have commenced discussing it in the same serious business tone in which they argue questions of parliamentary reform or of foreign policy.

And notwithstanding the disturbing novelty of the idea, and the difficulties of detail that at once suggest themselves when we approach the subject in a practical spirit; notwithstanding the thousand obvious perplexities and embarrassments that we can readily foresee as likely to arise from the actual extension of the suffrage to women, it is impossible to deny that, regarded as an abstract question, the weight of the argument is on the side of the advocates of this startling innovation. In this country, however, it is clear that the public mind is not yet prepared to consider the matter seriously, or even to regard it as worthy of being seriously considered. It is a natural tendency of the popular mind to regard whatever is entirely novel and without precedent in political institutions, as absurd; and it is only after becoming familiarized with the idea of such changes, by much discussion and continued agitation, that the masses of practical men learn to look beyond the commonplace objections and superficial difficulties which readily suggest themselves when a measure is proposed which is antagonistic to long-established notions. Meantime we see that a number of influential journals at the East have commenced the earnest advocacy of "Woman's Rights" in this practical form. The New York Independent declares that "all advanced thought is tending in this direction," and professes to "see everywhere the outcroppings of this stupendous question—a question which, sooner or later, will agitate the nation as the question of slavery agitated it."

At present we are unable to discern any portents of such an "agitation" as the Independent predicts. But should it come, we shall at least enjoy the consolation of knowing that it will be a peaceful one. Whatever may be the "rights of woman," they must be freely conceded by man; and fortunately there need be no apprehension of a civil war or a war of the sexes for the purpose of securing them.

THE MODERN HEROINE.—The change which has came over the romantic dreams of the short-story writer has been slow but insidious. The heroine, whose stateliness we loved, has become arch, vivacious, and witty to a painful degree. Instead of thrilling us with that melancholy glance which was supposed to express, in some orthodox manner, "the yearnings of a poetic soul," she now translixes us with sarcasm. Instead of those conversations magnificent in hyperbole and lofty sentiment, we have now badinage that becomes almost hysterical in its intensity. Her head no longer sinks on her lover's manly breast, as she "whispers sweet consent;" "a sudden expression almost of pain"—"a cold rigidity of the small lips"—"a mocking, but silvery laugh," is all that the bashful lover may look for. Not but that she has sentiment, but it is of a singularly perplexing and exasperating quality; she has a way of looking at you with "strange dumb eyes"—her glance is "trance-like" and "far off"—she is "sybilline," "fateful." She is no longer beautiful, but "singular looking." It may be easily imagined that a heroine of this order would not be satisfied with that one devoted lover which in former times was her predestined partner. She loves two. She is two or three times engaged. She is justified by a philosophy borrowed from our lively Gallic friends. She has all the benefit of those "extenuating circumstances" which French poetical justice admits equally as its literature and law. The modern short story gives us details, where formerly we had mere glittering generalities. The dress of our heroine is described with feminine precision; the writer no longer trusts to white muslin and simple "rose buds" for the hair. In the matter of accomplishments, the same care is displayed. Our heroine no longer allows her fingers to run carelessly over the piano while she listens to her lover's conversation; she deliberately sits down to Chopin or Schubert. We are forced to listen to an enthusiastic criticism of "Beethoven, choral symphony, op, 125," or a duo in E flat. We are crushed with her knowledge of botany; the "simple rosebud" her lover presents is technically considered; it is no longer pulled to pieces in bashful meditation—she "removes its petals." In the more pretentious short story, she generally has a profession—painter, musician, sculptor, governess, doctor.

A MONUMENT is to be erected in this city to the memory of the dead of the "California Hundred," and the "California Cavalry Battalion." The above named organizations have appointed a committee to collect funds, choose the location of the monument, and superintend its structure.

More Applications for the Editorship.

HAVING gone so far in the publication of the letters received at this office, in consequence of the rumored vacancy in the Editorial Chair of THE CALIFORNIAN, we have concluded to publish the remainder of the correspondence.

To the Proprietor of the Californian:

DEAR SIR:—In this crisis of our national affairs, politics constitute the all-absorbing topic. Your paper, in order to succeed, must have an under current of politicul principle. Literature without politics can possess but little interest. There are now for all practical purposes, but two parties, the Democratic, supported by Pre-ident Johnson and the patriotic masses; and the Rump-ites, supported by all the "isms." Who can doubt which is destined to acquire the ascendancy? The Democratic party is like the Roman Catholic Church, it has principles, and it has organization. It must succeed; and the gates of Hell shall not prevail against it. It is, Sir, the pride, the boast, the enthusiasm of my life, that I am, and always have been a Democrat. The first utterance of consecutive words, forming a sentence in our language, that came from my infant lips, was "Hurrah for Jackson!" Since that far off period of my budding existence, I have constantly, pertinaciously, and vociferously kept on shouting that war-cry, which to me, symbolizes freedom, Union, liberty, progress and religion. If I accept the Editorship of your paper, that cry will be its undertone—its diapason. As to my literary qualifications, I say nothing. Political rivals and envious Bohemians have accused me of dealing in platitudes, "hifalutin," "hosh," etc., etc., and have even compared my style of composition to that of "Kuzzilbash," and "Alphabet Kewen." But, Sir, if you have ever enjoyed the felicity of listening to my campaign speeches, in the Fourth Ward, or if you recollect, as you doubtless do, my gushing articles in the Alta, in praise of Matilda Heron, you will have perceived that I am capable of soaring into a pathetic region, at once higher and deeper, more humorous and more nebulous than any in which my detractors could sustain an unwearied wing. It was I, Sir, who wrote all those brilliant "leaders" in John McComb's Argus during the McClellan campaign. It was I who more recently wrote those "Letters to a Friend" in the Examiner, which excited the jealousy of Ben. Washington, and caused him to tremble lest Capt. Moss should turn him adrift, and invite me to occupy the vacant tripod. It is I who am regarded by Casserley and Hoge, and all the rest of them, with pangs of envy. Why, Sir, there is more fine writing in my last Oration before the Pioneers than all of them ever got off during the period of their aggregate lives. I may add that any one who has ever heard me talk, must be aware that I, like Bob Rogers, was one of the heroes of the Mexican War; and why, Sir, I would ask, should not a heroic and chivalric element be incorporated into THE CALIFORNIAN? I would add that I consider myself the wittiest man in California, with the exception of "Mark Twain;" though my wit is of so delicate a strain that it has never been known to provoke a laugh. I have made but two puns in my life; but those two are worth all that have been made during that lifetime; the only trouble about them, was that they needed too much explanation. Indeed, my famous "French-theatrical" pun upon the Soupe Maigre (thin supe) has never been understood to this day. The other pun was got off when Judge Baldwin urged me to run for Congress, instead of Downey, on which occasion I told him that my "feet" were so fast in "the stocks" that it was quite impossible for me to run.

Finally, without further nonsense, I offer myself as a candidate for the vacant Editorship. I can give your paper what it most lacks—point, sparkle, polish, and above all, a sound orthodox Democratic tone, of all which it is sadly in need.

I remain, Sir, your obedient servant,

T. W. FR—L—N.

Mr. Jefferson Snort on Boston School Marms in Our Public Schools.

MR. EDITOR:—Are we living in San Francisco, or in Boston? Is this great commercial emporium of the Pacific to be Bostonized, and to be brought within the sweep of the little provincial, six-inch radius of the "Hub?" If so, I want to emigrate, and see if it is impossible to find a spot anywhere on the top of this terraqueous globe, where the tyrannous influence of Puritanism has not extended. A few weeks since, my niece, Letetia Calhoun Jefferson Snort, arrived on these shores; though not educated at Mount Holyoke or Oberlin, she is a young lady of culture and accomplishments, thoroughly qualified for the position of teacher in the best young ladies' seminary in the land. Soon after her arrival I called with her upon several members of the Board of Education, with a view of obtaining for her a position as teacher in one of the Public Schools. I presented her certificates and credentials, but, before even so much as glancing at them, the Hon. Members of the Board enquired, "Is the young lady from Massachusetts?" And on receiving a reply in the negative, intimated that there was no chance for the applicant. No one, it appears, is considered qualified to teach in our Public schools, unless he or she hails from Yankeedom. "You see, sir," said one Hon. Member of the Board, "we have so many thoroughly-trained teachers of the highest qualifications, continually arriving here from Boston, that we scarcely have need of any others; in fact, all others may be regarded as superfluities, the Boston supply quite equals the demand; the Boston article is, in short, so superior to any other article in the market, that we have practically adopted the motto, 'None other need apply.'"

Now, Mr. Editor, I ask you, in all seriousness and solemnity, is not this monstrous? I repeat it sir, are we to be Bostonized? Are the educational institutions of this great city to be under the exclusive and despotic domination of a parcel of narrow-minded, snivelling, psalm-singing, blue-bellied Yankees? I know all about these model Boston school marms; nine out of every ten of them were Lowell factory girls, who, after saving a couple of hundred dollars, started for Oberlin, procured what they call an "education" at that negrophilist and free-love institution, and after "graduating" set up as strong-minded women, and went into business as abolition lecturers, dressmakers, medical clairvoyants, or fortune-tellers. Failing in these vocations, the last resort of the tribe is to start for California, and apply for positions in our schools. Is not this an infamous state of things? What is to be done? Yours indignantly,

JEFFERSON SNORT.

Drunken Babies.

The great question is settled. In spite of the eloquence of F. M. Pixley, the Board of Supervisors have decided that cows shall not be fed on distillery swill. The learned counsel for the milkmen and their cows, defended his horned clients boldly. He declared that: "When the Health Officer and a friend, after visiting the ranches and seeing the cows turned out full of life and spirit, came to town and reported the cows drunk, they let their imagination overcome their reason." Of course no one could object to every cow having a couple of "horns" when it got up in the morning; but we do not believe that the cows were in the habit of getting so terribly intoxicated as was reported. Pixley said this opposition to the use of distillery swill arose "all because animals have been reported drunk, when the cavorting which was seen was the exuberance of spirits, derived from perfect health." Certainly. They weren't drunk—only jolly. Who ever saw a cow as drunk as a man? A cow may know something about buttercups, but who ever saw a cow with the hiccups? Bah! A cow in its cups is an impossibility. Dr. Rowell declared that cows got "gloriously drunk." He said no animal could stand whisky but man, and he educated himself to use it. Mr. McCoppin proposed that the cows should be educated also. The end of the matter, however, was that this intoxicating food was forbidden to be given to cows, and the cows are henceforth a Temperance Legion. As this matter is settled, we can, without fear of frightening any fond mothers into fits, allude to one dreadful effect of this swill-milk on babies. We don't believe that the cows got drunk, but we are quite sure that their milk had a terribly intoxicating effect on babies. The Round Table has published a statement to the effect that the majority of the ladies of America are drunkards. What of that? While swill-milk was allowed to be sold in San Francisco, we don't believe there was one sober baby in the city. There were thousands of drunken babies. Wherever you went you could hear the yells of a baby who had got howling drunk on swill-milk. It was a fearful state of things. It is all changed now. There will be no more cases of delirium tremens among San Francisco infants now. No more inebriated children trying to pull snakes out of their socks. For the future it will be safe to speak to an infant; hitherto the chances were that the little dear, maddened with copious draughts of swill-milk, would hit out from the shoulder, and perhaps give you a black eye, at the same time using language which would, if you could understand it, make you shudder. We are thankful that while this was going on, we had no Round Table here to write an article on drunken babies. We have remained silent. Now the danger is past we speak. The babies of this city, for the most part, are becoming reconciled to losing their morning dram, though many have entirely refused to drink their milk until a spoonful or two of rum has been added. All honor to Dr. Rowell and the Bulletin, who have freed the cows and the babies of San Francisco from the terrible curse of drunkenness.

The Duty of a District Attorney.

As it appears that a misunderstanding exists in the minds of certain editors of newspapers, and of many thousands of persons engaged in various pursuits in the City and County of San Francisco, as to the duties incumbent on the person who fills the office of District Attorney, it will perhaps be as well for us to explain what the duty of a District Attorney is—in special cases. Of course when Lung Kee is charged in the Police Court with having stolen a chicken and thus committed the offence of petit larceny, it is not necessary for the District Attorney to appear in Court to guard the interests of the people resident in the City and County of San Francisco; the case of Lung Kee can be attended to by the Assistant District Attorney. If Jenny Knuck steals a handkerchief, it is the duty of the Assistant District Attorney to prosecute, and his superior officer need not trouble himself about the matter. Occasionally, however, a case may come before the Police Court which it is not proper to leave to an Assistant District Attorney—in fact, a case which imperatively demands the attention and personal presence of the DISTRICT ATTORNEY. For instance: A gentleman, a man moving in good society, one who has always been able to lay his hand on a few hundred dollars when he wanted it; a man who was never known to appropriate a chicken, like the depraved Lung Kee, nor to "prig a wipe," like the dishonest Jenny Knuck, has, for the purpose of speculating—in a gentlemanly manner—appropriated to his own uses money belonging to his employers. It will be observed that we are speaking of an entirely different case from that of a shop-boy who "borrows" two dollars and a half from the money druwer of the storekeeper by whom he is employed and trusted, for the purpose of trying his luck at poker. The gentleman, in the case which we are supposing, retains thousands of dollars for the purpose of speculating in mining stocks. In the case of the abominable little gambling shop-boy, who put two dollars and a half, received from the sale of goods owned by his employer, into his pocket instead of into the money drawer, the presence of the District Attorney would not be required in the Police Court; the Assistant District Attorney would prosecute the boy for stealing. In the case which we suppose, however—that of the gentleman who has "invested" thousands of dollars belonging to his employers in mining speculations—it is the duty of the District Attorney to call upon the counsel for the respectable prisoner, and if the counsel seems to think his client is not guilty, it is the duty of the District Attorney to think so in reality, and to attend in the Police Court to prevent the Assistant District Attorney—through a mistaken notion of his duty—from striving to convict a gentlemanly man; a man who has had money; a man who has friends; and, above all, a man whom his counsel, a learned lawyer, seems to think is not guilty. Then it is the duty of the District Attorney to tell the Judge that he thinks the respectable prisoner is not guilty, and if the Assistant District Attorney dares to open his mouth—to snub him severely. We believe that the above imaginary case is the only one in which the presence of the District Attorney, in the Police Court, can be positively beneficial to himself or to any one else.

A Live Queen.

San Francisco has for nearly two months been honored by the presence of the widow of an English Baronet, and our citizens have attended the nightly levees held by Lady Don with commendable zeal. Her ladyship has entertained her guests so well that all confess that it has been long since so charming a lady has landed on these shores. On Sunday the loud-mouthed cannon will probably roar a welcome to the widow of a King. We must let the "Lion's Mouth," in anticipation of her arrival, roar its welcome to Queen Emma of the Sandwich Islands. The Alta gives an account of the honors which are to be paid to this distinguished visitor. The Hawaiian standard is to be hoisted on the Occidental Hotel, the Mayor will receive her, a barouche, drawn by four white horses, is to be in readiness on the wharf, and the Vanderbilt is to be placed at Queen Emma's disposal to convey her to Honolulu. So far the Alta does very well. It continues: "This action on the part of our Government is a well-merited compliment to our Hawaiian neighbors, whose trade has grown to be one of the leading, and is among the most important to the Pacific coast. In the one item of sugar"—Sugar! O, this is terrible! The Hawaiian standard waving over the Occidental, the Mayor receiving Her Magesty on the wharf, the barouche with four white horses; all these were described in Fitz Smythe's best style, but after bringing thus vividly before our eyes all the pomp and grandeur attendant on royalty, to say: "In the one article of sugar!"—Oh 'twas vile! We really had great hopes that the Court Circular, which the Alta will no doubt publish daily, would be got up in a superior style, but that Fitz Smythe will, we feel convinced, be continually dragging in some reference to sugar, or pulu, or trade in some shape or other. The Alta must engage a special Jenkins. If Felix O'Byrne were still with us he would do capitally; but alas! he has gone to join the Fenians! We still hope that the Alta will prove itself equal to the occasion, and that in addition to a barouche, four white horses and a Mayor, Queen Emma will be honored by a Court Circular in the Alta.

A Birch for Americans.

An English showman has arrived in this country, who, we are glad to observe, has a good opinion of America—at present;—he is anxious to retain this good opinion, and hopes to be able to give a good account of the men, manners, and customs of America on his return to England. Thus:

"Mr. Birch begs to say that from Americans abroad he has experienced the utmost courtesy and kindness, and by them been assured of a cordial reception in a country which, as the grandest in the world he has long wished to visit, and of which, as an observer of men, manners, and customs, he is anxious to give a faithful description on his return to England."

He intends to give to those who vitit his show a number of tea-caddies and other articles, "as souvenirs of Mr. Birch's visit to America." We urge, we pray, we beg, we beseech the citizens of San Francisco to walk up, hurry up, tumble up, to see Mr. Birch's Diorama. We beg that they will do this, not for the sake of Mr. Birch, whose entertainment has been "honored by the distinguished patronage of Her Grace the Duchess of Beaufort, the Rt. Hon. the Countess of Yarborough, the Rt. Hon. the Dowager Countess Cowper, the Rt. Hon. the Viscountess Combermere, the Rt. Hon. the Lady Mary Craven, his Grace the Duke of Leinster," and a great many other members of the nobility of England who have a particular fancy for dioramic views; we have a more patriotic end in view; we are anxious that Mr. Birch,

When he returns to Albion's isle,
His toils and dangers past—
May give of us darned Yankees here,
A good account at last.

If the people of San Francisco don't go to see Mr. Birch's dioramic show, we tremble for the consequences. The reputation of our country is at stake.

Beware of Widows.

Weller the elder's advice to Samivel, "Beware of a vidder," might perhaps, apply in the following case. The Alta publishes an advertisement, which runs as follows:

A YOUNG WIDOW LADY, well educated, and a good musician, just arrived from Philadelphia, desires a situation as housekeeper; is experienced in housekeeping, having been accustomed to living in the best of style for the last two years in Germany, and entertaining handsomely; is fond of reading, and understands driving fast horses. To save trouble, no notice will be taken of replies to this advertisement unless enclosing real name and residence. Would be willing to return to Europe. Address, etc.

We fancy that a widow who understands driving "fast horses," and who has been "living in the best of style for the last two years in Germany and entertaining handsomely," would make a very desirable "housekeeper" for an old gentleman who had lots of money and wished to get rid of it expeditiously. This advertisement is headed, "Housekeeper." Would not "Horsebreaker" have been more appropriate?

Rather Cool.

In Thursday's Alta was published an account of the difficulties which Cyrus W. Field had to contend with in starting the Atlantic Cable enterprise. This occupies about half a column of the Alta, is published without credit and commences thus: "There is an unwritten history of the connection of Mr. Field with the Atlantic Cable that may have a peculiar interest at this time."

This "unwritten history" is extracted from a volume entitled, "History of the Atlantic Telegraph," by Henry M. Field, D. D., published a few weeks ago in New York. This work is so well written, and describes so vividly the hopes and fears of the inaugurator of the enterprise of the present century, that papers which make extracts from it should give credit to Henry M. Field, who is entitled to honor as having faithfully chronicled the labors of his brother.

Her Majesty at Hand!

At last San Francisco will be honored with the presence of a Queen! "Mark Twain" and other Sandwich Island missionaries, now sojourning in this city, are requested to be on hand to-morrow, immediately after morning service, at the Folsom street wharf, to assist in the "Reception." Inasmuch as her Majesty is rather "dark-complected," we trust that, during her visit, the Street Railway conductors will be careful what they are about. It wouldn't sound well abroad if, through some stupid mistake, "the Queen" should be ordered out of the cars.

Rather Dangerous.

Mrs. Denny, who shot at Mrs. De Wolf, has been acquitted of an assault with a deadly weapon with intent to murder. If Mrs. Denny did not intend to murder Mrs. De Wolf, she certainly was careless about running the risk of doing so. Ladies are not good shots as a rule, but we don't think it is quite safe to allow them to shoot at one another with pistols without fear of punishment. Some man standing near during one of these feminine shooting scrapes might get hurt.

A MIDNIGHT DUEL IN 1850.

A STORY OF THE PARKER HOUSE.

WILLIAM HENRY WHITE, who evidently sojourned in California in the early days, is writing "Hope's Fruition, A Story of California," for the New York Atlas; from which we copy the following sketch of the fatal duel between Bartlett and Burnett, which took place during a drunken orgie at the Parker House in the summer of 1850. Bartlett was or had been a policeman. Burnett came to California with the Stevenson Regiment, and, after living a life of dissipation for some ten years after the duel, died on the passage to Panama while on his way to New York. Many old residents of that period will remember the event, the incidents of which are related with the closest fidelity:

"One evening in the latter part of the month Brodt and I, for lack of anything more amusing, visited Dr. Robinson's pretty little 'Dramatic Museum,' and were agreeably entertained by the 'artless simplicity' of Mrs. Birrell, the natural acting of Mr. Vincent, the strict propriety of Mr. Everard, the vagaries of the comic Fairchild, and the quaint humor of the whimsical Robinson—Doctor, and lately-made Alderman.

"When the curtain fell upon the last act of the 'Dead Shot,' we made our way through the crowd and passed into Kearny street.

"After several strolls up and down that narrow and rather muddy thoroughfare, and when we had sufficiently contemplated the beauties of the moon-lit heavens from the classic precincts of Portsmouth Square, we found our way into the public room of the Parker House.

"The place was full of revellers, gamblers, idlers and sight-seers.

"In the bar-room Fairchild, the comic-singer and actor, was holding forth in his peculiar style to an appreciative audience of 'fellow-pilgrims.'

"The gambling-tables were crowded, 'bankers and buckers' being equally busy in taking up and laying down their stakes. Pictures of classic beauties, in primitive costume, hung around the walls; music was sounding from the orchestra-platform, canary-birds sung as if trying to burst their tiny pipes, gold rattled, glasses jingled and oaths mingled. Excitement ran high and revelry was rampant. There was nothing remarkable in all this. In the Parker House, or in any house or hotel in San Francisco at that time, and all through the State, such scenes were common. But the events which occurred on this particular night, the 28th of July, at the Parker House, are so vividly impressed upon my memory that they stand out in bold relief from hundreds of others less salient in their features.

"We remained seated at a table in the corner with a bottle of 'choice Burgundy" between us, of which we did not partake very freely.

"The time wore away till the clock in the saloon struck one, and the crowds in the rooms were begining to disperse, when we were suddenly arrested by a new excitement. A quarrel had commenced in the bar-room. Two New York sporting men—Charles Bartlett and Charles Burnett—between whom a bitter feud had been for some time festering, met on the sidewalk in front of the house. The former was accompanied by a few friends, the other was unattended. After a few words had passed between the two B.'s, somebody proposed that all hands should go in and take a drink all round. All hands went in. The drinks were taken and repeated. But the liquor did not soothe the passions of the imbibers, and the quarrel broke out afresh—Bartlett being the noisest and most belligerent. Pistols were drawn, and nearly all the idlers vanished at an astonishing rate of speed, to avoid the stray shots that they thought were pretty sure to follow. It was the rule for spectators to disperse when shooting was about to begin; for experience had developed the fact that the bullets on such occasions generally fell in the greatest quantities among those who were the least interested. The pistols drawn were all in the hands of the Bartlett party. It was at this juncture that Brodt and I became spectators of the scene. As we entered the bar-room from the adjoining apartment, one of the parties, Bartlett, pistol in hand, was loudly asserting that Burnett was a d——d poltroon, and wouldn't fight.

"I've got no pistol," responded Burnett, "and you know it; and I don't want to fight, anyhow, if I can help it."

"'Of course, you don't. D—n you, I've a good mind to shoot you as you stand.'" And Bartlett brought his revolver down horizontally. Burnett then exclaimed, excitedly, 'Gentlemen, don't let him murder me; if I must be shot at, give me a chance to shoot back. Will somebody lend me a pistol?' A pistol was produced by a person who appeared to be a stranger, and handed to Burnett. It was a six-shooter.

"The doors leading into Kearney street were closed and locked by the barkeeper, to keep out straggling citizens and officious policemen, I suppose; and somebody else had done the same to the door between the rooms on the other side.

"The barkeeper was anxious that the battle should be fought out without interruption.

"'Gentlemen, must I fight? Charley Bartlett, do you mean it?'" said Burnett, after he had seen, by a hasty glance, that the pistol was loaded and in good working condition.

"'Fight!'" 'Fight!' was the excited replies. 'Fight it out, and have it settled.'

"'All right. But remember, all of you, that this is forced upon me. If somebody will measure off five paces, I'll be ready for you, Charley Bartlett.'

"The stranger who had lent Burnett his pistol then stepped off five very short paces, commencing at the street-end of the bar-counter and ending at the office-safe that stood near the door leading into the gambling-room. Burnett took his station at the counter-end; Bartlett placed himself near the safe.

"'Must this duel go on?'" exclaimed the stranger. 'Is there no other way to settle the quarrel?'

"'No, sir!'" shouted Bartlett. 'If Charley Burnett won't fight, d—n him, I'll shoot him, anyhow!'

"'Well, then, go ahead,'" replied the stranger, 'and take care that you don't hit the wrong targets; we object to being bored by such grave mistakes.'

"The spectators, about a dozen in all, crowded away from the principals as close to the walls as they could get. Some of the more timid took shelter under the counter. Brodt and myself backed up into a corner where we were as far out of range as it was possible to get in that narrow bar room. For a moment there was a pause. The time-piece over the bar indicated that it was now within ten minutes of two o'clock. The duelists stood facing each other, scarcely a dozen feet apart, in the full blaze of the brilliant lamp-light. Both were inflamed by liquor, but neither was drunk. They were fine-looking young men, of about the same age, were well-dressed and had the appearance, at least, of gentlemen. Like native New Yorkers generally, they were intelligent, if not intellectual. Both had the air of persons accustomed to the lavish expenditure of money. Bartlett was the burliest of form and ruddiest of face. Burnett was more shapely and of greater apparent refinement.

"Both were evidently men of courage.

"Although now bitter enemies they had once been schoolmates and warm friends. Suddenly they raised their pistols. Crack! A shot came from Bartlett and crash! over Burnett's head, went the glass fixtures of a globe lamp. Crack! A bullet sped from Burnett, and the woodwork of the partition behind his opponent flew in splinters.

The locks of all fire arms except dueling weapons, as a rule, work stiffly. Such was the case with the revolvers used in this fight, which probably accounts for the inaccuracy of aim displayed by both.

"Bang! A second shot from Bartlett, and a second lamp was shivered to atoms.

Barelett quickly cocked his revolver again and was in the act of pulling the trigger when Burnett fired his second shot. Both explosions blended in one report. Bartlett's bullet narrowly missed his old schoolmate's head and crushed through the bar-room window shutters into Kearney street.

"Burnett's shot was better aimed. Bartlett's pistol hand sunk to his side, his weapon dropped to the floor, he stood for an instant, staring fixedly at his old friend and then without a word fell face downward upon the floor—dead.

"His old friend's bullet was in his heart.

"In the confusion which followed, Tom and myself quietly left the room to avoid an arrest. The police were certain to be there in force before long.

"We chose to give our evidence at the inquest at our own discretion, rather than to be forced to the same result at the point of the law as defined by over-zealous policemen.

"We were not required at the inquest the following afternoon, as there were witnesses enough to prove a clear case without us. Burnett was exonerated and discharged from custody, and the remains of Bartlett were borne from the Parker House to the cemetery with a grand display of post-mortem honors that would have astonished the poor fellow could he have looked from his rosewood and satin surroundings and seen the pomp and pageant of his funeral."

A TRAGIC NOVEL.—Violetta started convulsively, and turned her tear-drenched eyes wildly upon the speaker; for, to her, there seemed something familiar in these low, rich tones. Their eyes met; his beaming with love and tenderness, and hers gleaming with wild uncertainty. "Violetta!"—"Allendorf!" And the beautiful girl sank, from excess of joy, upon his noble heart, throbbing with the pure, holy, delicious love of other days. Allendorf bent tenderly over her, and bathed her pure white temples with the gushing tears of deep, though subdued joy. While doing this, Violetta's father, Rip Van Snort, was seen approaching the lovers with a flail. The aged patriarch saw Allendorf, and just as he was turning the corner of the red barn, gave him a lift with the flail that placed him on the "other side of Jordan." Violetta, driven to distraction, threw herself upon the grass, and for a long, long hour, was deaf to every consolation.

DEEDS of kindness cost but little of themselves, yet who can estimate their value!

NEW YORK MISERS.

IT is not generally known that New York at the present time contains a large number of misers as inveterate and degraded as any on record, and if we had space we could give a series of portraits of wealth and avarice which would make the reader shudder. Many of these misers are old business men who have withdrawn from active life and still keep up their faded and weather-stained signs, and beneath the garb of trade ply their money-saving habits. These men will be found sitting solitary in dingy offices, filled with cobwebs and thick with the dust of years. Money borrowers know where to go, and here these pale and threadbare fossils receive the best securities for their daily loans. Some of these half starved wretches, whose trembling hands can hardly sign a check, can draw for sums that would shake a bank. One of the richest men in the city is now to be found in just such a dingy hole as we have described, where he loans enormous sums daily. He was a merchant once, and his old sign is still up; and inside all things remain as they were a half century ago. He suffers daily for the comforts of life; but all this is compensated for by the pleasure of accumulation. "They come to me to beg," said the old man to an acquaintance, "and there's not a beggar in New York that does not live as well as I do"—a statement which was quite true.

A specimen of the better class of this genus was given in the late Exchange place robbery, where Rufus Lord, a man upwards of fourscore, was the solitary occupant of an office which contained between one and two million dollars in stocks and securities—all his own. Here this old man sat, day after day, accumulating at the rate of $2,000 per week, and no doubt hoping in due time to get rich. Such a hoard was worth tapping, and the job was one of the neatest and most successful ever done in New York.

The late Stephen Whitney was a striking instance of the commercial miser. When we knew him he had made about ten millions, and at the age of twenty-five was trying hard to get rich. The person and countenance of this wretched man were a study. The tremulous form, the sharpened features and the solicitous eye told of the one idea which mastered the soul. Mr. Whitney was, in his day, to be seen habitually in Wall street, picking his way along among brokers and sharpers, and buying notes, of which he was a good judge. He bought none but the best, and seldom made a bad purchase. His son in-law was in a heavy business; but his paper was not considered first rate; the only chance of his success being that the old man would keep him up. This chance we used to hear often discussed, and on its probabilities his paper found a market. But the old man did not keep him up; and he showed himself too sharp to be gulled even by so near a relative. Mr. Whitney was something of a politician; and on one occasion the leaders of his party came with an application for funds for electioneering purposes. "Gentlemen," was the reply, "I am with you, heart and body. As for money, I have none; but to help along, I will come and sit up all night and fold ballots."

Some of these New York misers are utterly recluse, while others are social and often meet to discuss methods of money making. The group occasionally seen in a certain old rookery, where a few millions are represented in hungry forms and seedy raiment, would be a study for an artist. The great complaint with this class is that "interest is down, money is cheap and the county is going to ruin. Only five per cent. on good paper, and six on bond and mortgage; and as for seven-thirties, they pay well enough, but one may get his throat cut taking care of them. The world's made up of thieves and beggars, and there's no use of trying to get along."—N. Y. Citizen.

SIGHTS IN GERMANY.—A correspondent of the New York Turf, in Germany, writes: "What a queer sort of a country this is to a man fresh from America. The roads stretch away for miles and miles together, under the shade of a double row of cherry and apple trees; there are no fences beside the road, none around the fields, none even around most of the houses. One sees no cattle, except now and then a small herd watched by a keeper, throughout a dreary day; no sheep, except under the same conditions; no horses at all, no swine, and not even any geese and chickens. All are kept up in their places, and I have laughed more than once to see a stout Dutchman driving a flock of geese or a brood of chickens on their morning or evening promenade.

ROBERT HALL did not lose his power of retort even in madness. A hypocritical condoler with his misfortunes once visited him in the mad-house, and said in a whining tone, "What brought you here, Mr. Hall?" Hall significantly touched his brow with his finger, and replied, "What'll never bring you sir—too much brain."

SPEAKING of a young man who is in the habit of serenading the young ladies of that city, the Selma Messenger says—"For having heard him declare, in tuneful strains, to each of six young ladies in one evening that she was 'all the world' to him, we can safely endorse him as the worst 'harmonious lyre' of our acquaintance."

AGUA DE MAGNOLIA.—The prettiest thing, the "sweetest thing," and the most of it for the least money. It overcomes the odor of perspiration; softens and adds delicacy to the skin; is a delightful perfume; allays headache and inflammation, and is a necessary companion in the sick room, in the nursery and upon the toilet sideboard. It can be obtained everywhere at one dollar per bottle.

NO FORFEITING.—Heretofore, if a person holding a Life Policy became unfortunate, and could not raise the sum of money required to pay his next premium, his policy was declared forfeited. The BROOKLYN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK has decided to make EVERY POLICY it issues NON-FORFEITABLE, giving a PAID-UP POLICY to the party if unable to continue his payments of premiums. The dividends of the Brooklyn Life Insurance Company are settled annually in cash. This plan is far more acceptable to insurers than at the end of three or five years, as in other companies. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company allows thirty days grace in the payment of premiums. Its policies are incontestable, and its losses are promptly paid. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company offers every known plan of Life and Endowment Insurance. Get a pamphlet at the office, 240 Montgomery street, southeast corner of Pine, from Stephen T. King, General Manager, or David B. Arrowsmith, Local Agent.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

EMPEROR MAX has received important news from his vrow, Carlotta; though his having no children, accounts for his not having heard that at C. A. FLETCHER'S, No. 1 Montgomery street, can be found the largest and most elegant assortment of BOY'S CLOTHING there is in the city. Boys' Suits as usual made to order from a superior line of Cloths and Cassimeres, always on hand, after the regular Eastern Fashion Plates, received monthly; this being the only Boys' Clothing House in receipt of them. A large assortment of Gentlemen's Fine Clothing and Furnishing Goods, Traveling Trunks, Valises, etc., at all times, and at the most reasonable rates.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—The pictures taken in this city are far superior to those taken in the East and Europe. We account for this simply from our atmosphere, which is lighter and clearer than any other. And this is why so many arriving here have noticed how much better pictures look here than at home. The best gallery to seek out is one which has the most light, and with few high buildings surrounding it. The NEW YORK, on the east side of Third street, a few doors below Market, has more light than any other in the city, and their pictures give more satisfaction, and are far cheaper than those from Montgomery street galleries.

LADIES, ATTENTION!—Direct Importation from Paris.—Please recollect that there is only one Shawl House in California, J. D. Robert. 119 and 121 Montgomery street, which receives direct, Genuine Square and Long Broche Cashmere Shawls of every description and price, from Robert, Gosselin & Son, manufacturers in Paris. Don't make a mistake.

N. B.—Cloaks, Basques, Zouaves and Dresses of every description made to order in the latest style. Prices as cheap as possible.

ALL GOOD JUDGES OF PIANOS agree that Frisbee & Scott have the finest and largest stock of Pianos in this city. They are agents of the celebrated firms of Culenberg & Vaupel, of New York, and Knabe & Co., Baltimore. There is certainly not an instrument equal to those imported by them. Mr. Gusvav A. Scott pays, also, particular attention to having their stock of foreign and American sheet music equal to any New York store. They keep at No. 3 Montgomery street, Masonic Temple.

JACOB SHEW & Co., No. 315 Montgomery street, near Pine, take First-Class Photographs, of all kinds, at the lowest scale of prices adopted by the Associated Photographers. Photographs retouched in the highest style of the art.

A SUMMER AND WINTER MEDICINE.

"Great oaks from little acorns grow."

The worst diseases known to the human race spring from causes so small as to almost defy detection. The volumes of scientific lore that fill the tables and shelves of the medical fraternity only go to prove and elaborate these facts.

Then guard yourselves while you may. The smallest pimple on the skin is a tell-tale and indicator of disease. It may fade and die away from the surface of the body, but it will reach the vitals, perhaps, at last, and death be the result and final close. Maggiel's Bilious, Dyspeptic and Diarrhœa Pills cure where all others fail. While for Burns, Scalds, Chilblains, Cuts, and all abrasions of the skin, Maggiel's Salve is infallible. Sold by J. Maggiel, 43 Fulton street, New York, and all Druggists, at 25 cents per box.

"THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR HOW TO LIVE, AND WHAT TO LIVE FOR."—This is the title of an interesting and highly useful little book, published by Dr. Beck, of this city. It is especially adapted for the perusal of young men, nevertheless its truthful pages should be read by all, as they contain good, sound, healthy matter which can be easily understood and appreciated by every reader. This work is issued gratuitously on application to the Doctor, or will be sent free to any address on receipt of postage stamp or envelope addressed to Dr. Beck's office, 314 Kearny street, or post office Box 1599.

Dr. Beck is a member of several American and European Universities, and has published numerous works on Anatomy, Medicine, and Surgery His former connection with the principal "Anatomical Museums" of New York, Paris, London, etc., combined with his experience in his profession render him a highly desirable person to consult, and we can confidently recommend him to the public.

HALL'S SARSAPARILLA YELLOW DOCK AND IODIDE OF POTASS.

THE

Best Blood Purifier Known.

Persons that are troubled with Rheumatism, Scrofula, Neuralgia, Morbid Liver, Salt Rheum, Pimples, Boils, or any of the many diseases that originate from Impure Blood, would find it much to their advantage to give this justly celebrated article a trial. One or two bottles are quite sufficient to convince the most skeptical of its merits. It contains neither Spirit, ARSENIC nor MERCURY which cannot be truly said of any other preparation called "Sarsaparilla."

AYER'S

Cathartic Pills,

ARE THE MOST PERFECT purgative which we are able to produce, or which we think has ever yet been made by anybody. Their effects have abundantly shown to the community how much they excel the ordinary medicines in use. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. Their penetrating properties stimulate the vital activities of the body, remove the obstructions of its organs, purify the blood, and expel disease. They purge out the foul humors which breed and grow distemper, stimulate sluggish or disordered organs into their natural action, and impart a healthy tone with strength to the whole system. Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases. While they produce powerful effects, they are at the same time, in diminished doses, the safest and best physic that can be employed for children. Being sugar-coated, they are pleasant to take; and, being purely vegetable, are free from any risk of harm. Cures have been made which surpass belief, were they not substantiated by men of such exalted position and character, as to forbid the suspicion of untruth. Many eminent clergymen and physicians have lent their names to certify to the public the reliability of our remedies, while others have sent us the assurance of their conviction that our Preparations contribute immensely to the relief of our afflicted, suffering fellow men.

The Agent below named is pleased to furnish gratis our American Almanac, containing directions for the use and certificates of their cures, of the following complaints

Costiveness, Bilious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache arising from foul stomach, Nausea, Indigestion, Morbid Inaction of the Bowels and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Diseases which require an evacuant medicine. They also, by purifying the blood and stimulating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach, such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability, Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout, and other kindred complaints arising from a low state of the body, or obstruction of its functions.

Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand AYER'S and take no others. The sick want the best aid there is for them, and they should have it.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY SMITH, Plaintiff, vs. WILLIAM SMITH, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to WILLIAM SMITH, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and that one half of the Defendant's property, if he have any, be awarded to Plaintiff, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 27th day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

DR. MAGGIEL'S

Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these

LIFE-GIVING PILLS!

Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, but to cure. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be

A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,

For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle-aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, that Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever

AN ETERNAL SPRING!

It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.

THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES

Cannot stay the flight of years, but they can force back, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, but seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—

FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS

Nothing can be more productive of cure than these Pills. Their almost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest

VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.

FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS

And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, but penetrates with the most searching effects to the very root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills

Invariably cure the following diseases:

Asthma,
Bowel Complaints,
Coughs,
Colds,
Chest Diseases,
Costiveness,
Dyspepsia,
Diarrhœa,
Dropsy,
Debility,
Female Complaints, Fever and Ague
Headache,
Indigestion,

Liver Complaint,
Lowness of Spirits,

NOTICE.—None genuine without the engraved trade-mark around each pot or box, signed by Dr. J. Maggiel, 43 Fulton st., New York, to counterfeit which is felony.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND

IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.
2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.
3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.
4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.
5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.
6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.
7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.
9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.
10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

and is most desirably located for Homestead purposes.

It is directly east from the lands of the California Association.

The property has been purchased on very reasonable terms, and offers a rare opportunity for investment.

A number of fine houses are in process of erection, and streets are being graded near this property, which will greatly increase its value.

When twelve monthly payments have been made, the property will be divided among the members in the usual manner, and each shareholder will receive a contract for a deed to the lot or lots to which he may be entitled, and have the privilege of taking immediate possession of the same.

The lots average 27 feet in front by 120 feet in depth The whole amount due upon any lot may be paid at any time, and discount at the rate of one and one-half per cent. per month will be deducted therefrom.

Persons wishing to visit the lands of this Association will take the Turk street cars to Devisadero street, and thence go northerly along Devisadero to Pine street.

Twenty thousand dollars of the capital stock is taken, and the books are open for subscription to the balance at the office of the Secretary, where the Official Map of the Association can be seen, and full particulars obtained.

The Title to this Property is Perfect.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure, but

NEWELL'S

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup.

A PERFECT

Hair Restorer AND Hair Dresser

BOTH COMBINED IN ONE.

First—It is not a Dye.

Second—Will not Color the Skin.

Third—Will restore Gray Hair to a beautiful Black, Brown, Auburn, or whatever might have been its original color, and cause it to assume its former beauty.

Fourth—Will cure all Humors and Diseases of the Scalp.

Fifth—Will remove Dandruff and Scurf from the head, and keep the hair moist and silk like in its appearance as in youthful days.

Sixth—Will promote a healthy growth.

Seventh—Will prevent it from falling off, and cause it to grow on bald heads where there is life and vitality at the roots, but where these are gone there is no hope of success.

Eighth—The best testimony that can be given will be found inside of each bottle.

Warranted to do all we claim for it, or the money refunded after using two bottles. Try it and be convinced.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea-sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

AGENTS WANTED TO CANVASS FOR THE only official Southern History of the War. THE LOST CAUSE, by E. A. Pollard, the popular Historian of the South, and editor of the Richmond Examiner during the war. Complete in one large royal octavo volume, with

24 FINE STEEL PORTRAITS,

giving a full and authentic account of the rise and fall of the late Southern Confederacy. Written under the encouragement of Generals R. E. Lee, Johnston, Beauregard and others. The work is being liberally patronized by leading men of all classes, eager to hear

"THE OTHER SIDE,"

and thus arrive at the truth of history, which it is impossible to do from the many histories written only from a Northern stand-point.

Agents and the public are cautioned against any other work purporting to be this one. To energetic men and women a rare chance is offered to make money. Don't fail to send for circulars of this great and important work. Adddress

MY GUIDE.

I QUESTION not; I doubt thee not—
Oh, Christ, my tender guide,
But I will humbly follow thee
Whatever ill betide.

Walk in the shadow of thy cross,
The cross thou bear'st for me;
Nor murmur at my lot—if nought
Divideth me from thee.

No fears shall keep my tearful face
Upon the painful road;
But I will cling to thy dear hand,
And fix my eyes on God.

So my glad heart shall straight forget
The soreness of my feet,
And find its happy rest at last,
Before the Mercy Seat. CLYTIE.

SEPTEMBER, 1866.

"MARK TWAIN" AT THE ISLANDS.

THE HIGH CHIEF OF SUGARDOM.

I HAVE visited Haleakala, Kilauea, Wailuku Valley, the Petrified Cataracts, the Pathway of the Great Hog God—in a word, I have visited all the prineipal wouders of the island, and now I eome to speak of one which, in its importance to America, surpasses them all. A land which produces six, eight, ten, twelve, yes, even thirteen thousand pounds of sugar to the acre on unmanured soil! There are preeious few acres of unmanured grouud in Louisiana—none at all, perhaps—which will yield two thousaud five hundred pounds of sugar; there is not an unmauured acre under cultivation in the Sandwich Islands which yields less. This country is the king of the sugar world, as far as astonishing productiveness is coneerned. Heretofore the Mauritius has held this high place. Commodore Perry, in his report on the Mauritius, says:

"Before the introduction of guano into Mauritius the product of sugar on that islaud was from 2,000 to 2,500 pounds to the acre; but the increase since the application of this fertilizer has been so extraordinary as to be scarcely credible. In ordinary seasons the product has been from 6,000 to 7,000 pounds, and under peculiarly favorable circumstances it has even reached 8,000 pounds to the acre."

It was "scarcely credible." Guano has not been used in the Sandwich Islands at all, yet the sugar crop of Maui averages over 6.000 pounds straight through, all the time, for every acre cultivated. Last year the average was 7,000 pounds per acre on the Ulupalakua plantation; this year the "plant" crop on the Wailuku plantation averages 8,000. Portions of the Waikapu, Wailuku, Waihee, Ulupalakua, and many other plantations have yielded over 11,000 pounds to the acre, and twenty acres on the fourth named averaged the enormous yield of 13,000 pounds per acre one season! These things are "scarcely credible," but they are true, nevertheless.

By late Patent Office Reports it appears that the average sugar yield per acre throughout the world ranges from 500 to 1,000 pounds. The average in the Sandwich Islands, lumping good, bad, and indifferent, is 5,000 pounds per acre.

COMPARATIVE.

In Louisiana, sugar planters paid from $20 to $200 an acro for land, $500 to $1,000 apiece for negroes, $50,000 to $100,000 for stock, mills, etc., raised 1,000 to 1,500 pounds of sugar to the acre, sold it for 5 and 6 cents—and got rich.

In the Islands wild sugar land is worth from $1 to $20 an acre, mills and stoek cost about the same as in Louisiana. The hire of each laborer is $100 a year—just about what it used to eost to board and elothe and doctor a negro—but there is no original outlay of $500 to $1,000 for the purchase of the laborer, or $50 to $100 annual interest to be paid on the sum so laid out. The price of sugar is double what it was in Louisiana, and the aetual net profit to the planter, notwithstanding high freights and high duties, is also double.

When the production of a staple steadily increases and capital sticks to it and shows confidence in it, it is fair to presume that investments in it are considered secure and profitable. In 1839, '40 and '41, the yield in Louisiana ranged along in the neighborhood of 100,000.000 pounds annually—price, 4, 5, and 6 cents a pound. In 1852, '53, and '54, her yearly yield fluctuated between 350.000.000 and 500,000.000 pounds—market price, 3½ to 5 cents. Thus 1,000 to 1,500 pounds to the acre, at 3½ to 6 cents, was so encouraging as to more than quadruple Louisiana's sugar production in less than thirty years. Six or eight thousands of pounds to the acre, at 10 to 15 cents a pound, has encouraged the extravagant advanee in the Islands from 3.000,000 to 27,000,000, annual yield, in four years Against this argument in favor of the security and productiveness of capital invested there, no logic can prevail.

PLANTATIONS.

There is more than one plantation in the islands which is worth, with all its appurtenances, $250.000, and will produce a $260,000 crop next year—perhaps this—and yield a profit of $70,000, after deducting all expenses of cultivating, shipping, and disposal in San Francisco, and interest.

One of the best plantations in the Islands, though not one of the largest, by any means, cost, with its appurtenances, $100,000. All bills were promptly paid and no debts allowed to accrue and breed interest. The consequence was, that three years after the first plow disturbed its virgin soil, it had paid for itself and added a dividend of $20,000.

LABOR.

The principal labor used on the plantations is that of Kanaka men and women—six dollars to eight dollars a month and find them, or eight to ten dollars and let them find themselves. The contract with the laborer is in writing, and the law rigidly compels compliance with it; if the man shirks a day's work and absents himself, he has to work two days for it when his time is out. If he gets unmanageable and disobedient, he is condemned to work on the reef for a season, at twenty-five eents a day. If he is in debt to the planter for such purchases as clothing and provisions, however, when his time expires, the obligation is canceled—the planter has no recourse at law.

COOLIES FOR CALIFORNIA.

You will have Coolie labor in California some day. It is already forcing its superior claims upon the attention of your great mining, manufacturing and public improvement corporations. You will not always go on paying $80 and $100 a month for labor which you can hire for $5. The sooner California adopts Coolie labor the better it will be for her. It cheapens no labor of men's hands save the hardest and most exhausting drudgery—drudgery which neither intelligence nor education are required to fit a man for—drudgery which all white men abhor and are glad to escape from. You may take note of the fact that to adopt Coolie labor could work small hardship to the men who now do the drudgery, for every ship load of Coolies received there and put to work would so create labor—would permit men to open so many mines they cannot afford to work now, and begin so many improvements they dare not think of at present—that all the best class of the working population who might be emancipated from the pick and shovel by that ship-load would find easier and more profitable employment in superintending and overseeing the Coolies.

People are always hatching fine schemes for inducing Eastern capital to the Pacific coast. Yonder in China are the capitalists you want—and under your own soil is a bank that will not dishonor their checks. The mine purchased for a song by Eastern capital would pour its stream of wealth past your door and empty it in New York. You would be little the richer for that. There are hundreds of men in California who are sitting on their quartz leads, watching them year after year, and hoping for the day when they will pay—and growing gray all the time—hoping for a cheapening of labor that will enable them to work the mine or warraut another man in buying it—who would soon be capitalists if Coolie labor were adopted.

The Mission Woolen Mill Company take California wool and weave from it fabrics of all deseriptious, which they challenge all Ameriea to surpass, and sell at prices which defy all forcign competion. The secret is in their cheap Chinese labor. With white labor substituted the mills would have to stop.

The Pacific Railroad Company employ thousands of Chinamen at about $30 a month, and have white men to oversee them. They pronounce it the cheapest, the best, and most quiet, peaceable and faithful labor they have tried.

Give this labor to California for a few years and she would have fifty mines opened where she has one now—a dozen factories in operation where there is one now—a thousand tons of farm produce raised where there are a hundred now—leagues of railroad where she has miles to day, and a population commensurate with her high and advancing prosperity.

"MARK" BECOMES PROPHETIC.

With the Pacific Railroad creeping slowly but surely over mountain and desert and preparing to link her with the East, and with the China mail steamers about to throw open to her the vast trade of our opulent coast line stretching from the Amoor river to the equator, what State in the Union has so splended a future before her as California? Not one, perhaps. She should awake and be ready to join her home prosperity to these tides of commerce that are so soon to sweep toward her from the east and the west. To America it has been vouchsafed to materialize the vision, and realize the dream of centuries, of the enthusiasts of the old world. We have found the true Northwest Passage—we have found the true and only direct route to the bursting coffers of "Ormus and of Ind"—to the euchanted land whose mere drippings, in the ages that are gone, enriched and aggrandized aueient Venice, first, then Portugal, Holland, and in our own time, England—and each in suecession longed and sought for the fountain head of this vast Oriental wealth, and sought in vain. The path was hidden to them, but we have found it over the waves of the Pacific, and American enterprise will penetrate to the heart and center of its hoarded treasures, its imperial affluenee. The gateway of this path is the Golden Gate of San Franeisco; its depot, its distributing house, is Califfornia; her customers are the nations of the earth; her transportation wagons will be the freight cars of the Pacific Railroad, and they will take up these Indian treasures at San Franeiseo and flash them across the continent, and the vessels of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company will deliver them in Europe fifteen days sooner than Europe can obtain them by any route of her own she could devise.

California has got the world where it must pay tribute to her. She is about to be appointed to preside over almost the exclusive trade of 450.000.000 people—the almost exclusive trade of the most opulent land ou earth. It is the land where the fabled Aladdin's lamp lies buried—and she is the new Aladdin who shall seize it from its obscurity and summon the geni and command him to crown her with power and greatness, and bring to her feet the hoarded treasures of the earth!

I may have wandered away from my orginal subject a little, but it is no matter—I keep thinking about the new subject, and I must have wandered into it eventually anyhow.—"Mark Twain," in the Sacramento Union.

CLINGING FOR LIFE.

I CALL myself an old married man now, for it is twelve years since Nelly and I walked arm in arm out of Wardborough Church man and wife, and Nelly turned her head over her shoulder, looked up at the spire, and then turned so pale and tremhly that I thought she would have fainted away. Ah! it's many a time since I've looked up at that spire in my dreams, and shrieked out and struggled till Nelly has woke me up and I've found myself batbed in perspiration and tremhling like a leaf. Always the same when I get one o' those nasty feverish colds; it seems to fly into my head aud make me half delirious, and theu at night comes that same one horrible dream.

Yon see I once made a bit of a fool of myself, and I suppose I don't stand quite alone in the world. I was a tall, stripping young fellow in those days, with a werry strong feeling of admiratiou for somehody as we'll put down here as Number 1; while, to he just, I had a much stronger feeling of admiration for somebody else, in the shape of a bright-eycd workman's daughter, called Elleu Morris. There ain't no such person now, for she's grown iuto my comely wife—Nelly Wellis, thank goodness—a pretty apple blossom growed into a sound, haudsome fruit, with pleuty of pips in the eore, and every one a virtue such as is a hlessing to a staunch English working man.

Well, I'm not ashamed to own it, I loved Ellen Morris very dearly, and she knew it too; but, like a great many girls of her age and educatiou—ay, and I think I've heard say, like some of better education, too—she must be light, and skittish, and coquettish, and play off a young fellow named Phil Harris against me till I've felt that heart sick aud miserable that I conld have rnn away and never secn her again. Many's tbe time since that she's told me it was ouly to try me and to see whether I really did love her; but if I ever have grown up girls of my own I shouldn't recommend the plan, for it nearly turned my love into hitterness and Elleu's coquetry into repentance. I knew her father liked me, for there was always a hearty slap for me on the shoulder whenever I met him; but the more Nelly saw this, and the more attentive I got to he the more willful my lady grew, until she almost drove me mad.

I couldn't help it; it was my nature, I suppose, for I let her snap me off and snuh me without ever a word, for I was humble and snhmissive as a child, and followed her ahout like a dog—very olten too to he driven away. At last, though, I determined I'd stand it no longer.

"I know I ain't worthy of her," I says to myself, "hut I'll know one way or the other, and if she loves Phil Harris better than she does me, why, God bless her, I won't he the man to stand in the way." Then I walks on a little way, and I says again—"Sounds werry uice, Fred Wellis, hut you'd never have the heart to give her up."

And then I walks along the lane werry sad and downheart-ed, wondering at the feeling that had come over me, for I was quite changed then and a different mun to what I had heen a year hefore; and the eveuing heing very still—it was in June—I slipped out of the path into the copse, and lay down amongst thc moss under the hazel stuhs, and listened to the songs of the hirds. It was hot, and heavy, and close, and as I lay looking down through an opening in the trees at the old church I could see hehind it in the distance the faint flickering of the summer lightning.

I felt lower and lower as I lay there, and wondered what it all would come to, when all at once I felt the hlood rush into my face, for I heard a merry laugh, and, raising my head a bit, I could see Ellen Morris, her cousin—a girl of her own age—and Phil Harris walk by; and then, instead of getting up like a man and going and joining them, I let my head fall and lay there groaniug.

Next morniug, when we were all in the yard—Harris, and Ellen's father and me, and a few others—the guv'nor comes out and says that he's got orders from the church wardens to refix the weathercock on the top of the church spires.

"Now, it does seem a pretty affair," he says, "to spend a week or two fixiug and nnfixing ladders and scaffolding up that are sphere to do a tom tit of a job that a trowel and a bit of cement would finish in ten minutes."

Ellen's father said it did, certainly, but if it warn't done soon the next high wind would hlow the vane off, wheu it wouldn't be safe to fall through the church roof.

"Ah!" says the guv'nor, "it only wants a plucky yonng fellow to go up outside with a bit of that patent compo ready mixed—that as doesn't set so quickly—when it could soon he done, and cost the parish a sovereign where it will now cost tweuty times as much; and I don't like these jobs, for they look so hard at a long hill for so little work." And then the guv'nor stands up with his hands shading his eyes and looking up at the great towering spire with the vane all on one side and looking as dangerous as could be.

Now it so happened that the morning I was chislin' away at a tombstone, at finishing it off ready for letterin', and I felt that low and miserable that I could have wished for that stone to have been for myself; hut I wasn't going to let Phil Harris see that I was down, and so I hegins a whistling, hut stops all at once, for old Morris says—

"We shall have one of these youug sparks here a slipping up and doing it, I knuow."

But the governor shakes his head and says—

"No," he says, "I shouldn't like to set one of my men at such a risky joh as that; and then there was no more said about it.

I felt better that night, for old Morris had asked me to go down and smoke a pipe with him at his cottage just outside the town; and smoking a pipe with him meant sitting for a couple of hours in tbe same room with Ellen; and just at that time I was all up and down—clouds and sunshine. I was walking aloug, thinkiug what a happy life it would he if Ellen only liked; how hard I would work—what a cottage we would have, and how proud I should he of earning hit after hit of furniture to put in it—how bright and eheering it would be to go home from work, and see who was waiting for me; and there I went on mooneying along, till I stops short, for some one says,

"Let me pass; please."

I starts, and, as I said afore, stops short, for therc stood Ellen, looking handsomer than ever.

"Now or never," says I to myself, for we were standing in in a narrow lane, with barely room for two to pass hetween the thick hedges; and then bursting out with it all at once, or I shouldn't have got it said at all—

"Ellen," I says, "I am goiug to go away."

"Are you?" she says, with a half smile—it really was only a half smile, for I think there was a shade of darkness iu it.

"Yes, unless you say a loving word to stop me."

"What would I stop you for?" she says, "you know your own fancy best."

"My fancy's to stop here," I says, "Nelly, if yon'll let me; hut I can't stop here to have my heart broke, and he always miserable. Dear, dear Nelly, I can't talk like a hetter mau would, and tell you how I love you, for I'm only an ignorant workman; but though I've nothing to offer you but the love of an honest man, I"—

"Hush!" says Nelly, and she slipped by me and was twenty yards away before I knew what made her run off, which I now saw was Phil Harris, who had just turned into tbe lane. I'd have given my ears almost to huve stood and watched 'em, hut I thought it would look meau and shabby, so, making up my mind that I'd trouble my head no more about the affair, I walks on to the cottage, where I finds old Morris busy enough in his garden hoeing his potatocs.

"Now theu, lad," he says, "just in time to lend a helping hand."

"All right," I says, and directly after I was going down one o' the rows eartbiug the things up at a terrible rate.

"Geutly, gently," says old Morris, "you'll be cutting 'em to pieces."

But I couldn't stop, but went on chopping away like fury; lor I could see in a distauce them two coming down tbe road towards the cottage, and I'm afraid I made oue peck less ol potatoes in the erop thau I should have done.

"Here, suppose you weeds them onions Fred," says old Morris, "I'll finish earthing up;" and he comes over and takes away my hoc, as if he thought it wasn't safe to trust me with it. He was about right, too, for I should have done no end of mischief amongst the garden stuff.

I stoops down and goes at the ouions and, hesides weeding, I thinned 'em, too, pretty tidy, as I dragged at 'em, for I could hear steps and voices, and soon after them two came in at the gate, and I thought old Morris didn't look hest pleased ahout it neither, but he didn't say nothing.

Bimeby we goes in, after having a good wash down by the pump, and then, after sitting aud smoking a bit—Nelly all the time keeping as far off from me as possible—old Morris hegan to talk about the job as wanted doing to tbe spire, and he says—

"We're to hegin o' Monday morning, unless one o' you chaps uips up first."

"What's that, father?" says Nelly, looking up from her work.

"Why, the guv'nor was talking about mending the spire up a top; and I was saying whether Fred here or Phil Harris would go up and do it first."

"Not they," says Nelly, tossing her head; "they haven't got courage enough."

I looks at Phil Harris pretty sour, just to find as he was doing the same to me; and then old Morris says—

"Let's see; it's a hundred foot up to the top o' the tower, and ahout ninety-five foot up to the weather-cock. I shan't go on the job anyhow, if I can help it."

We spent a werry dull evening, and I kept thinking more and more of going away for I felt very discouraged und down; and at last gets up to go, thinking as Nelly would ask me to stay a little longer; hut she didn't, so I went off to my lodging and goes to hed.

It was a heautiful night; and when I had pulled up the hlind, so that I might wake early, I could lie there and see the great tall church spire shining in the moonlight, all as clear and distinct as could he, with the vane all on onc side; and then all at once I began to think what Nelly said.

"They haven't got courage enough;" and then I thinks to mysell as I dare do it; for when one a fellow was on top o' that tower he might climb the spire by the ornamental crockets as was carved on the stone, and at first there was one about every yard, hut as it got higher they were closer together; and as I lay thinking about it I felt my hands turn damp and hot inside, while I couldn't help shuddering.

"She wouldn't think auy more of me if I did it," I says: "but I would show her as I'm more game than Phil Harris; and if I was to fail, why, it wouldn't be much consequence."

Just then I falls asleep, and there I was in trouble, for Nelly was up atop of the spire crying for help, and as fast as I tried to climb up and briug her down, something kept putting me back, till at last I jumps up iu bed with my hair all wet and big drops on my forehead. Tben I goes to sleep; but there was the church spire in my dreams every time I dropped off; and at last just at dayhreak, I gets up, shoves my head in a hasin o' cold water, has a good rub, aud then looks at my watch, and finds it was four o'clock, I opens the window und then somehow or other hegins thinking about how would be the best way to get up the spire.

"Let's see," says I, "the bell house door's sure to be fast, but one can get on the roof o' the church, and then there's a door into the tower." And then I stood there watching till I don't know how it was, but I slipped down to the yard, shoves a trowel into my strap round my waist, and then goes to the shed, which I found open, mixes a bit of the compo and beats it up well, and pops it into a handkersher, and ties it up, and this I fastens to my strap too, so as I could shove it round bebind if I liked; and then I slips off to the churcb-yard.

The gates were locked, but I jumps over the wall and across the wet grass, while I couldn't help thinking it werry likely as I might want a stone myself; but somethiug seemed to draw me on, and I kept on, saying, "Haven't got courage enough, ha!" till I reached the little door in the round tower by the chancel. I gives it a push, finds it open, runs up the old, worn, corkscrew staircase, and stood soon on the lead roof, where I looked down at the town and began to feel a bit shaky, hut thought I'd go to the top o' the tower and look at the beautiful view, for it would be madness to climb tbe spire, for it looked so much harder now.

So I goes along the roof to the hig tower, where I'm blest if the ugly old corbels didn't seem to he winking aud laughing at me as the sun shoue upon them, till I passed through a little door aud went on—up—up—up, round the little staircase; now peeping through the narrow slits in tbe thick wall, now stopping to listeu at the door where the great clock goes tick-tack, tick-tack;" and then up again till I come to the place where the great hells were hung, and I stepped in on the oak beams, and then started, for there was a great whizzing noise and then a big hammer rose and struck five—making such a din as made me thrust my fingers in my ears until the noise was over.

Straight up above me, and lit by the little dormer windows, I could see ladder after ladder across and across going right up the spire, but they were nothing to me, so I goes up and up the round staircase ugain till I gets to the top and stands on the narrow leads where the spire sprang from, and then I should have fallen but lor the stone battlement, which was breast high.

I might well start, for there, about twenty feet above me was Phil Harris trying to swarm up the spire, with his dinner basket slung nnder his arm by a strap.

I did feel mad, for though a minute afore I was all of a shiver, and had quite given up all thoughts ol trying to climb, now I should have liked to have dragged him down, and was half disposed to run round the other side and hegin there.

"Hallo!" I says, aud he started so he nearly let go as he looked down aud saw me, and then, lowering himself from crocket to crocket, as we calls the little knob-like ornaments you see on some spires, he directly after stands alongside o' me.

"Can't he done," he says, lookiug quite pale aud white; "a monkey couldn't do it."

"Don't suppose anything could do it as didn't have pluck," I said jeeringly.

"I've got pluck enough to do anything you can, Fred. Wellis," he says, "now then!"

I never says a word, but pulls off my jacket and wesket; stieks my cap on tight, for there was a stiff hreeze up there; gets my trowel in my belt where it would he handy; and then shoves the bit o' cement in the handkersher behind me, and wets my hands ready for a start on the side where the wind hlew, so that it might push me towards the spire:

"Why, you ain't goiug to try?" says he; but I didn't answer, but draws myself up from crocket to crocket—and awful hard work it was; but I didn't feel a bit frightened now, and though I kept getting more tired, the job got easier and easier every minute.

Bimeby I passes one little window; and then I hears from down below some one a hooraying, and then a lot of shoutiug and talking, and I knows that's the people as have seen what I'm doing of, and that tbere's a crowd a collectin'; but I duren't look; but now and theu stopping for hreath, I goes on, up, and up, and up, till I'm werry near the top, and the spire gets thinner and thinner; while, though it's as fine and bright a morning as can be, the wind seems to blow terribly hard, and I can feel the stones I am on quite shudder like.

Now, don't you go and think as a spire when you gets near the top is a werry little thing, because it ain't; it's the distance off as makes it look so small, and even those little knobs as I got by was a good deal bigger than you might think; and when I'd got so far up that I could get my hands partly round and look about me a bit, the height seemed something awful—twice what it was when I was down below.

Phil Harris shouted something to me, but I don't know what, for I kept on climbing in a sort of mad frenzy, as you'd call it, and at last, with my trouser knees worn through and my hands bleeding, I lays my hand on the great thick copper support o' the weatbercock, and then my troubles seemed to begin, for I had only one hand to hold on by and one to work with. But I gets the trowel out and in my teeth, drags the cement round, and then has to get out my knife and slit the hankersher to get at the stuff; when, holding on with all my might, I tries to get the vane upright in its place.

To look at it from below that seemed easy enough, but the thing was about six foot high and it was only by climbing a bit higher I could move it at all and then as fast as I got it upright the wind had such power that it blew it sideways again, and I soon found I was getting regularly done up with my job. Cement! I might just as well have had a bit of gum, for the thing wanted its lower part wedging in with bits of stone and then to be held firm while plenty of compo was applied; and so I finds as I can't do the least good after all my trouble; and begins to get down.

And how was that to be done?

"Same way as you got up," p'raps you'll say. Jes so; but how about losing nerve and strength, and finding, when you're about thirty foot down that one of the crockets snaps right off, and you has to hold on for dear life, with the wind trying to tear you off like a dead leaf, and toss you on to the stone paving at the tower foot.

One of 'em did snap off; and I shall never forget the shudder as went through me, nor yet the wild shriek as came up from out the streets a hundred and seventy feet below me. But it was for life and I forgets my bleeding knees as I draws myself up again, climbs a bit higher, and there rests, panting, giddy, afraid to move and not daring to make another trial, though I could have reached the next ornament if I had lowered myself.

But I could not recover my nerve after that slip, and as I clung there I kept on trying to think it was all a dream. At last, though, I shouts out—

"Harris!" but there was no answer: and pressing flat up against the stones and stopped there without moving, with my mouth and lips and tongue parched and dry.

Close by me there was one of those little dormer windows, but it was composed of sloping bars and did not open, so that it seemed as though I was beyond reach of help.

All at once I heard a voice as I knew was that of old Morris, and he cries out twice over—

"Can' you get down, Fred?" But I couldn't answer; but half stood, half lay there with the wind still tearing at me as if to dash me off; and I was trying to reckon the minutes it would take before I should leave go and fall with a crash on to the tower and perhaps bound off again, to come down into the churchyard; while the last thing as I remember is thinking that perhaps Nelly would be sorry for me now.

* * * * * * *

And when Nelly had done telling me how her father, finding I didn't answer, had got inside, climbed the ladders, and kicked out the bars of the dormer window, when by leaning out he could get a good grip of my belt and hold on till help came, and then how they lowered me down with ropes, for I was quite insensible, and had to be carried home—when she had told me this as I lay on the little couch in their room; and when she told it all to me as she knelt by my side, begging and praying me to forgive her for tempting me to do such an horrible dangerous thing, I wouldn't speak for ever so long, not because I wouldn't forgive her, but because it was so sweet to lie there listening to her, and to see the tears shining in her eyes, and even running down her cheeks. It was that afternoon as a many promises were made between us; and one was about Phil Harris, and one was about never saying any more about what had happened this morning, while another which was made when Nelly's face was werry close to mine, was—

Well, I think I said afore there arn't no such person as Ellen Morris now.

LITTLE three-year old Jennie was playing very roughly with the kitten—carrying it by the tail. Her mother told her that she would hurt pussy. "Why, no I won't," said she; "I'm carrying it by the handle."

THE Columbine, the so-called women's paper, lately started in Paris, is dead—and "well dead," too. It was a disreputable affair, and a disgrace to the sex.

GOODWIN SANDS.

THE mention of the life-boat reminds me that I was at Saltburn, during one of those great gales which scatter so many wrecks, around our rock bound coast. From the lofty cliffs it was an awe-inspiring sight to watch the burst and listen to the whistle of the storm. Sad enough, next day, to walk along the coast and see the wrecks washed ashore, and to hear the dismal tidings come in, hour by hour, of the lives lost on that eastern cost since yesterday's sun went down! How many of those who read these lines have ever studied the "Wreck-Chart of the British Isles?" How many of them have ever spent (as I have done) an afternoon on the Goodwin Sands? For these, I here insert an anonymous scrap which I picked up some time ago. It will expresses the feelings called up by the desolation which follows an angry storm at any point on our shores: "It is a strange ramble amongst the ridges and hillocks of sand; and for all the tranquillity of the sea, for all the lustre of the sunshine, one can hardly help a sort of weird, wild feeling. The mystery and the dread of the place haunt you, even as you stroll carelessly on; the exceeding loneliness of it—the very gulls have flown away—is only intensified by the little groups of human beings, who look so small upon the great, long waste—the barren, rolling, shifting, pitiless wilderness. Thus dim, thus indistinct, might loom a caravan in Arabia; and the Goodwin Sands are the Sahara of the sea. They are a desert within a desert: themselves fatal, and circled by the fatal waves. Beautiful indeed they are with their placid lakes where the surface of the water is not broken by a ripple—beautiful, if you take them in mass, for the gleam with which they answer the glow of the sun—beautiful, if you take them in detail, for the delicate mouldings, fretwork, and tracery where the narrow streams have left the lonely record of their path: and it is a moment to be remembered when you sit down apart, and watch the white and green of the breakers that curl and curve around the barriers of the sand, and inhale that wonderful air which seems like the very essence of life long sought, and hearken to the prepetual wandering warble of the wind, that is now hushed into its softest and sweetest murmur. Beautiful, and yet terrible; for, try as you like, you can't forget the history of the Goodwins, and you know that the sad volume has many pages yet unturned. In one single November storm, a hundred and sixty years ago, thirteen men-of-war struck upon them, and were miserably engulphed, dragged down by the cruel quicksands, or battered to pieces by the breakers; and thousands since—from the stately East-Indiaman, home-returning, with two hundred souls on board, to the poor little fishing-smack, with just a couple of sailors and a boy-have gone down as wretchedly. You think of the dark nights of winter' when the wind blows a hurricane dead on shore—when the lights can be seen through the wild whirl and drift of scud and spray and snow—and when gallant men are horribly swallowed up by this huge cruel monster, that waits and watches, that wakes and kills. Thank God that for every story of calamity we can quote another of human daring and endurance; that, when the storm does come, the plainest, roughest boatman on the coast is touched, if but for a moment, by a spark of that electric fire which kindles a man's nature into heroism! As for the dead, if they died at their post and doing their duty, we need not insult their memory by laments; for, after all, there was that in them which no storm could kill; and as for the change which we dimly know as death, it was, for brave men, a beautiful death to die!"

That noble society, the "National Life-boat Institution" has a station at Saltburn, and a fine sight it is to see the crew exercised. Almost under the shadow of lofty Huntcliff lies the little trim boat-house with the tiny craft which can live though the hour of danger and with its skilled hands save lives from that waste of waters.—London Society.

MARRIAGE.—Marriage is to a woman at once the happiest and saddest event of her life; it is the promise of future bliss raised on the death of present enjoyment. She quits her home, and her parents, her companions, her amusements—everything on which she has hitherto depended for comfort, for affection, for kindness, and for pleasure. The parents by whose advice she has been guided—the sister to whom she has dared to impart the embryo thought and feeling—the brother who has played with her, by turns the counselor, and the younger children, to whom she has been hitherto the mother and playmate, are all to be forgotten at one fell stroke. Every former tie is loosened, the spring of action is changed, and she flies with joy in the untrodden paths before her, buoyed up by the confidence which love has inspired. Woe to him who has too early withdrawn the tender plant from the props and stays of moral discipline in which she has been nurturned, and yet makes no effort to supply their places; for him is the responsibillity of her errors on him who first taught her by example to grow careless of her duty, and then exposed her, with a weakened spirit and unsatiated heart to the wild storms and the wily temptations of a sinful world.

THE latest bon-mot about Bismark is, that his face depended not upon a thread, but upon a needle.

AN INCIDENT IN SCOTT'S LIFE.

"IOPEN the year 1814, says Lockhardt, with a melancholy story. Mention has been made, more than once, of Henry Weber, a German scholar, who escaping to this country in 1804, from misfortunes in his own, excited Scott's compassion, and was thenceforth furnished, through his means, with literary employment of various sorts. Weber was a man of considerable learning; but Scott, as was his custom, appears to have formed, an exaggerated notion of his capacity and certainly countenanced him, to his own severe cost, in several most unfortunate undertakings. When not engaged on things of a more ambitous character, he had acted for ten years as his protectors amanuensis; and when the family were in Edinburgh, he very often dined with them. There was something very interesting in his appearance and manners; he had a fair, open countenance, in which the honesty and enthusiasm of his nation were alike visible; his demeanor was gentle and modest, and he had not only a stock of curious antiquarian knowledge, but the reminisceuces, which he detailed with amusing simplicity, of an early life, checkered with many strange-enough adventures. He was, in short, much a favorite with Scott and all his housebold, and was invited to dine with them frequently, chiefly because his friend was aware that he had an unhappy propeusity for drinking, and was anxious to keep him away from places, where he might have been more likely to indulge it. This vice, however, had been growing upon him: and of late, Scott had found it necessary to make some rather severe remonstrance about habits which were at once injuring his health and interrupting his literary industry.

"They had, however, parted kindly, when Scott left Edinburgh on Christmas, 1813; and the day after his return, Weber attended him as usual in his library, being employed in transcribing extracts during several hours, while bis friend, seated over against him, continued working at the Life of Swift. The light beginning to fail, Scott threw himself back into his chair, and was about to ring for candles, when he observed the German's eyes fixed upon him with an unusual solemnity of expression. "Weber," said he, "what is the matter with you?" "Mr. Scott." said Weber, rising, "you have insulted me, and I can bear it no longer. I have brought a pair of pistols with me, and must insist on you taking one of them instantly." And with that he produced the weapons, which had been deposited under his chair, and laid one of them on Scott's manuscript. You are mistaken, I think," said Scott, "in setting about this affair, but no matter. It can be no part of your object to annoy Mrs. Scott and the children; therefore, if you please, we will put the pistols into the drawer till after dinner, and then arrange to go out together like gentlemen." Weber answered with equal coolness, I believe that will be better," and laid the second pistol on the table. Scott locked them both in his desk, and said, "I am glad you have felt the propriety of what I suggested; only let me request further that nothing may occur, while we are at dinner, to give my wife any suspicion of what has been passing." Weber again assented, and Scott withdrew to his dressing-room, from which he immediately dispatched a message to one of Weber's intimate companions; and then dinner was served, and Weber joined the family circle as usual.

He conducted himself with perfect composure, and every thing seemed to go on in the ordinary way, until, whisky and hot water being produced, Scott, instead of inviting his guest to help himself, mixed two moderate tumblers of toddy, and handed one of them to Weber, who, upon that, started up with a furious countenance, but instantly sat down again, and, when Mrs. Scott expressed her fear that he was ill, answered placidly that he was liable to spasms, but the pain was gone. He then took the glass, eagerly gulped down its contents, and pushed it back to Scott. At this moment, the friend who had been sent for made his appearance, and Weber, on seeing him enter the room, rushed past him and out of the house, without stopping to put on his hat. The friend, who pursued instantly, came up with him at the end of the street, and did all he could to soothe his agitation, but in vain. The same evening he was obliged to be put in a straight wristcoat; and though, in a few days, he exhibited such symptoms of recovery that he was allowed to go by himself to pay a visit in the north of England, he there soon relapsed, and continued ever afterwards a hopeless lunatic, being supported to the end of his life, in June, 1818, at Scott's expense, in an asylum of York."

F. FUSTER proposes to cure all cases of consumption by the administration of raw meat and spirits. Although his method of treatment has not long been employed by Continental physicians, considerable testimony has been borne to the great success which has attended its employment. The new treatment has now been tried satisfactorily in two thousand cases of phthisic. The raw meat is reduced to a pulp, mixed with sugar to conceal its unpleasant flavor, and administered in doses of one hundred to three hundred grammes per day. The alcohol (of the strength of twenty degrees Baume) is given in doses of one hundred grammes a day.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications:]

THAT highly pretentious journal, the New York Round Table, which has for several months past pursued a course clearly indicating that its one great object was to make a "sensation" and attract the public attention, at whatever sacrifice, has succeeded in eliciting a letter from Miss Braddon, the popular English novelist, which it undoubtedly regards as "a card," calculated to enhance the notoriety at which it aims. The occasion of the letter, is a characteristically vulgar notice in the Round Table of a work attributed to Miss Braddon, which notice was probably a bait for just such a communication as it has elicited. The following is a portion of the letter of the indignant novelist to the editor of the Round Table:

Sir:—I have been favored with a copy of your journal for July 14, 1866. In it I perceive that you review, as written by me, a novel entitled What is this Mystery? published in New York by Messrs. Hilton & Co. Allow me to say, in reply to your most illiberal criticism, that I never wrote a novel with the title given, and that I have never had any correspondence with its publishers, who, nevertheless, announce their book as printed from my "advance sheets" and who also characterize the work as "Miss Braddon's latest and best." It may be—I hope it is not—in accordance with American notions of literary fair dealing to make these positively false statements. Messrs. Hilton & Co. may derive profit from them; but the true interests of literature and its commerce cannot be served by such audacious mendacity.

Let me add that literary criticism, as a corrective influence, is not advanced by personalities; and that it is insulting to an author and unfair in itself to assume, as you do when reviewing What is this Mystery? that "her (the author's) creations were the result of the meditations and inspirations of a milliner's shop." This remark is simply impertinent, and it is only as true as may be the assertion that the review in which it appears is the result of the meditations and inspirations of a tailor's shop; though why good and wholesome "meditations and inspirations" should be foreign to milliners' and tailors' shops, I am at a loss to discover. Moreover, offensive criticism will rather deter than encourage literary aspirants—always a very sensitive race—for whose advent you insert, in the same number of the Round Table, an elaborate demand. I have the honor to be, Sir,

Your most obedient servant, M. E. Braddon,
Author of Lady Audley's Secret, etc.

London, July 30, 1866.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe's "Chimney Corner," in the September number of the Atlantic, is devoted to the subject of amusements. The article is in the form of a discussion between several interlocutors, and some views which are put into the mouth of one of them, "Bob Stephens," will undoubtedly be considered extremely radical by a large portion of the religious community. Yet it seems to be a fair inference from the general tenor of the colloquy that Mrs. Stowe's own real convictions and feelings on the subject, find expression in "Bob's" outspoken utterances. We give a few extracts:

THE ATTITUDE OF THE CHURCH IN REFERANCE TO AMUSEMENTS

The only thing that the Church has yet done, is to forbid and frown. We have abundance of tracts against dancing, whist-playing, ninepins, billiards, operas, and theatres—in short anything that young people would be apt to like. * * * The theatre and opera grow up among us like plants on the windy side of a hill, blown all awry by a constant blast of conscientious rebuke. There is really no amusement that young people are fond of, which they do not pursue in a sort of defiance of the frown of the religious world. * * * * *

The whole department of amusements—certainly one of the most important in education—has been by the Church made a sort of outlaws' ground, to be taken possession of and held by all sorts of spiritual ragamuffins; and then the faults and short-comings resulting from this arrangement have been held up and insisted on as reasons why no Christian should ever venture into it.

If the Church would set herself to amuse her young folks, instead of discussing doctrines and metaphysical hair-splitting, she would prove herself a true mother, and not a hard-visaged step-dame. Let her keep this department, so powerful and so difficult to manage, in what are morally the strongest hands, instead of giving it up to the weakest.

I think, if the different churches of a city, for example, would rent a building where there should be a billiard-table, one or two ninepin-alleys, a reading-room, a garden and grounds for ball-playing or innocent lounging, that they would do more to keep their young people from the ways of sin than a Sunday school could. Nay, more: I would go further. I would have a portion of the building fitted up with scenery and a stage, for the getting up of tableaux or dramatic performances, and thus give scope for the exercise of that histrionic talent of which there is so much lying unemployed in society.

Young people do not like amusements any better for the wickedness connected with them. The spectacle of a sweet little child singing hymns, and repeating prayers, of a pious old "Uncle Tom" dying for his religion, has filled theatres night after night, and proved that there really is no need of indecent or improper plays to draw full houses.

Here we have, not only a distinct endorsement of "parlor theatricals," but an implied approval of the opera and the theatre, if not as they are, at least as they might be made provided the religious portion of the community would take an interest in them and exert their influence in improving and elevating them.

WHAT YOUNG PEOPLE NEED—AND WHAT THE THEATRE MIGHT BECOME.

The things that draw young people to places of amusement are not at first gross things. Take the most notorious public place in Paris,—the Jardin Mabille, for instance,—and the things which give it its first charm are all innocent and artistic. Exquisite beds of lilies, roses, gillyflowers, lighted with jets of gas so artfully as to make every flower translucent as a gem: fountains where the gas-light streams out from behind misty wreaths of falling water and calla-blossoms; sofas of velvet turf, canopied with fragrant honeysuckle; dim bowers overarched with lilacs and roses; a dancing ground under trees whose branches bend with a fruitage of many colored lamps; enchanting music and graceful motion; in all these there is not only no sin, but they are really beautiful and desirable; and if they were only used on the side and in the service of virtue and religion, if they were contrived and kept up by the guardians and instructors of youth, instead of by those whose interest it is to demoralize and destroy, young people would have no temptation to stray into the haunts of vice.

In Prussia, under the reign of Frederick William II., when one good, hard-handed man governed the whole country like a strict schoolmaster, the public amusements for the people were made such as to present a model for all states. The theatres were strictly supervised, and actors obliged to conform to the rules of decorum and morality. The plays and performances were under the immediate supervision of men of grave morals, who allowed nothing corrupting to appear; and the effect of this administration and restraint is to be seen in Berlin even to this day. The public gardens are full of charming little resorts, where, every afternoon, for a very moderate sum, one can have either a concert of good music, or a very fair dramatic or operatic performance. Here whole families may be seen enjoying together a wholesome and refreshing entertainment—the mother and aunts with their knitting, the baby, the children of all ages, and the father—their faces radiant with that mild German light of contentment and good will which one feels to be characteristic of the nation. When I saw these things, and thought of our own outcast, unprovided boys and young men, haunting the streets and alleys of cities, in places far from the companionship of mothers and sisters, I felt as if it would be better for a nation to be brought up by a good strict schoolmaster king than to try to be a republic.

In alluding to Queen Emma's recent visit to New York, the Citizen, edited by Miles O'Reilly, made an appeal to "Jenkins" as follows:

One would think, in looking at the chronicles of Queen Emma's daily doings, that he was reading the utterances of snobbish English journals, whose chief delight is to revel in the names and titles of the great people they are permitted to talk about. The visit of that royal lady to America is undoubtedly one of significance and hope for the future of American interests in the beautiful islands where she is still a power. But we must confess to a shrinking from this inordinate and overwhelming prostration of body and soul before every "royal" or "princely" person who approaches our shores. There is reason in all things. Queen Emma deserves to be handsomely received and most hospitably entertained, both in her own right, as a lady distinguished by superior accomplishments and rare personal worth, and also as a representative of a people whose good will we desire, and whose importance as guardians of the central entrepot between the vast commercial interests of the Orient and the Occident, is increasing most rapidly. But while this is so, and while it may be a graceful courtesy to seem more appreciative of the honor of a lady's visit than if it were a distinguished man, there can be no necessity for forgetting our own dignity. We simply lower ourselves without elevating our guests; and it is to be hoped, therefore, that "Jenkins" will restrain himself.

Mr. Greeley's great sensation book, the American Conflict, bids fair to obtain a greater sale than any work of the day, pretending to a historical character. The leading Eastern journals, including some that are decidedly antagonistic to the author in politics and his views of the war generally, speak very favorably of the book, and of the impartiality (so far at least as intention is concerned) that characterizes it. On this latter point, the New York Citizen says:

That class of people who gain their idea of Mr. Greeley from the clamorous ignorance of July rioters—who are strongly conservative, but whose conservatism is summarily comprehended in the saying, "D—n a nigger anyhow, and Horace Greeley too"—probably entertained strong doubts of Mr. Greeley's fitness to become the historian of a struggle in which he had taken so prominent a part. They looked upon him as a man whose hot prejudices would blind and warp his judgment; as a fanatic, incapable of a broad, liberal view of men and of events. Those who knew him better never doubted his eminent fitness for the task. Mr. Greeley's convictions, whether right or wrong, are the results not of passion and prejudice, but of an honestly adopted and consistently adhered to theory of morals and of government. He will strongly condemn and combat men's deeds when they are at variance with his settled convictions of right and justice; but the meanness that goes behind the actions of men and impugns their motives, that denies sincerity and honesty to political adversaries, finds no lodgment in Horace Greeley's bosom. There need be no fear that the American Conflict will be a vehicle for partizan bitterness.

JUSTICE TO M'CLELLAN.

In reference to the slowness of McClellan's advance against Lee just previous to the battle of Antietam, Mr. Greeley says:

He moved slowly because uncertain, as were his superiors, that the rebel movement across the Potomac was not a feint.

It is easy now to reproach him with the slowness of his advance from Washington to Frederick; but it must be borne in mind that his force consisted of the remains of two beaten armies—his own and Pope's—not so much strengthened as swelled by raw troops, hastily levied for an emergency; while opposed to him was an army of veterans, inferior, indeed, in numbers, but boasting of a succession of victories from first Bull Run onward, and proudly regarding itself as invincible. Perplexed as to Lee's intentions, and hampered by the necessity of covering at once Washington and Baltimore, McClellan moved slowly, indeed; but only a great military genius, or a rash, headstrong fool, would have ventured to do otherwise. After he learned at Frederick that Lee had divided his army, in his eagerness to clutch the tempting prize, McClellan blundered sadly in not hurling his army at once on McLaws, and thus cutting his way swiftly to the Ferry. Yet, with all his mistakes, he moved vigorously enough to have seasonably relieved Miles, had that officer evinced loyalty and decent fitness for his position, or had Ford defended Maryland Heights with vigor and tenacity.

A HIT AT GEN. HALLECK.

The Citizen alludes to the distinguished Commander of the Pacific, as, "the universally friendless, because universally misunderstood, General Henry Wager Halleck." We are inclined to think that both the "friendlessness" and the "misunderstanding" are somewhat exaggerated in their extent, by the Citizen; assuredly "universality" cannot be predicated of either. That Mr. Greeley neither admires nor understands the General sufficiently appears from the following mild allusion:

Halleck's insisting that Harper's Ferry should be held, after he knew that the rebel army had crossed into Maryland, is one of those puzzles so frequently exhibited in the strategy of the Generalissimo, which must find their solution in some higher, subtler, and more leisurely existence.

Among the more noteworthy books recently published in the United States, is Histoire de Jules Ce'sar, par S. M. I. Napoléon III., Tome Deuxiems—being the completion of Napoleons celebrated history. This edition being in French, will be preferred to the excellent translation recently published by the Messrs. Harper, at least by all who are able to understand the original. This work is a beautiful specimen of book-manufacture—being printed with clear-cut type on heavy, creamy paper, with colored maps. The publishers are Messrs. D. Appleton & Co.

This enterprising house has also published Taxation; its Levy and Expenditure, Past and Future—being an inquiry into our financial policy, by Sir S. Morton Peto, Bart.,—which, though having primary reference to England, is still of great interest to all students of political economy in our own country.

From the same source we have, Recent British Philosophy; a Review, with Criticisms, including some Commentaries on Mr. Mill's Answer to Sir Wm. Hamilton, by David Masson. The title-page gives a general idea of the character of the work, which will be gladly welcomed by the many students of "Hamiltonism."

Messrs. Harper & Bros. have just published Battle-pieces and Aspects of the War, by Herman Melville, who will be remembered as the author of Omoo, Typee, etc.

Messrs. Ticknor & Fields have issued Four Years of Fighting; a volume of Personal observations with the Army and Navy, from the first Battle of Bull Run to the Fall of Richmond, by Charles Carleton Coffin. "Carleton," of the Boston Journal, was considered one of the most graphic correspondents of the war, and his observations in a handsome volume with illustrations, maps, etc., cannot fail to prove attractive to those having a taste for war literature.

Among recent English publications, we notice The Contemporary Review, a handsome octavo of 664 pages; The Argosy, a bound magazine of tales, travels, essays, and poems, from such writers as Chas. Reade, Mrs. Oliphant, and Jean Ingelow.

Love amid Ruins.—Declarations of love are frequently seen on the walls of Pompeii, and both the style and their orthography prove that they were written by all classes of society. Some of them are satisfied with celebrating their beloved ones with verses, particularly from Ovid. There are also passages from poets whose works are lost, and some of the poets made the verses themselves. "May I die," you read on the wall, "if I would be a God without thee!" Most of them speak in prose, and sometimes in tolerably barbarian prose. Some of the inscriptions declare love and wrath with great frankness. "My dear Sava, love me I pray thee." "Nonio greets her friend Pagarus." "Meta, the actress, loves Contus with her whole heart. May the Pompeian Venus be propitious to them, and let them ever live in harmony." "Asselia, may'st thou wither." "Virginia to Tertius: Thou art too ugly for me." Only in one instance does a man express love for his wife; another reveals the whole of a little romance. A poor lover, deserted by his fair one, finds her again, after having long searched for her, and writes on the house where she lives: "There she is, there she is; no more doubt as to this; Romula lives here with a rascal."

Putting a Good Face On.—The staid book house of A. Roman & Co. have just had a new front placed in their store, and now present as an attractive appearance as any store on Montgomery street.

Eastward Bound.—An unusually large number of our prominent citizens depart this morning on the Sacramento; many of them being accompanied by their families.

AMUSEMENTS.

MADAME CELESTE made her debut in the Woman in Red, before a California audience at Maguire's Opera House, on Monday evening last to an overflowing house. The play is said to have been suggested by the abduction of the "Mortara" child by the Papal authorities a number of years ago; and the story, like that of Gamea, is one of a loving mother seeking her child through years of sorrow. The first peculiarity noticable in Madame Celeste is her strong foreign accentation, which falls strangely upon the ear, and, in her rapid declamatory passages, makes it somewhat difficult to follow her. Her action was exceedingly dramatic and artistic, and shows the studious artist in every movement; yet still there was wanting a vital power or electrical force sufficient to awaken that sympathetical feeling in the audience with the character assumed, so essential where the pathetic feelings are the ones solely appealed to. The play was placed on the stage in a most creditable manner, with effective costumes, tableaux and groupings, and with splendid new scenery, by the Tornings. Madame Celeste was ably supported by Miss Kate Denin, Mrs. Jackson, Mrs. Judah, Miss Goodrich, and by Messrs. McCullough, Wilson and others.

The Woman in Red has been played all the week to good houses without creating any great enthusiasm, which, from the nature of the play and the familiarity of the story to the public, it could not be expected to do. We are fully convinced that Madame Celeste will make a more decided impression in some of her other plays—in Green Bushes, and Flowers of the Forest, for instance.

This afternoon and evening the Woman in Red will be presented for its last representations. On Monday evening the House on the Bridge will be produced, which, report says, is not of the pathetic and sorrowful order; but something fresh, striking, and sensational, with nothing of the "Sorrows of Wester" hue about it.

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.—Don Giovanni, which constituted the last regular performance of the second season, was also brought forward to inaugurate the third, on Monday evening last. There were many creditable features in the representation, but the opera is not adapted to the powers of the artists, and was hardly so successful as to warrant a repetition by the present company. Signor Milleri, who kindly undertook the part of "Leporello," hardly needed the indulgence which had been bespoken in advance; his acting was quite up to the standard of the rest. M'lle Tourney, as "Elvira," deserves perhaps more praise than any other singer in the cast, having appeared to better advantage than in any character yet assumed by her. Signorina Brambilla, as "Zerlina," sang "Batti, batti," and "Vedrai carino," with exquisite taste and expression, but her conception of the character does not satisfy us; nor do we think Signor Mancusi by any means successful as "Don Giovanni," although his rendering of "La ci darem," "Fin ch' han dal vino," and other gems, displayed his usual artistic vocalization. Herr Schraubstadter, as "Masetto," and M. Roncoveri, as the "Commandant." were very good; while Signora Bianchi, as "Donna Anna," and Siguor Banchi (in the place of Siguor Morley) as "Don Octavio," did the best they could in parts not suited to them.

Signorina Brambilla took her first benefit on Wednesday evening, the opera being Il Barbiere di Siviglia. The house was full and enthusiastic, and the cantatrice was overwhelmed with floral offerings from the audience and from several of her fellow artists. Her singing of the Bolero from the Sicilian Vespers, and of Ricci's graceful Waltz, in the music lesson scene, was rapturously applauded.

La Sonnambula was given last night, La Juive having been postponed until Monday, when we believe it will positively be given.

This evening Ernani will be repeated, for the benefit of the Clerks' Relief Association.

ENGLISH OPERA.—Signor Bianchi announces that the Howson English Opera troupe will give a series of performances at the Metropolitan theatre on the off nights of the Italian opera, commencing with Der Frieschuetz, on Tuesday evening. The simple and pleasing style of music usually found in English opera, well rendered by these promising young artists, should win its way to the hearts of a large class of our music-loving people.

MARK TWAIN IN TROUBLE.—The public of San Francisco are already apprised by enormous posters covering all the bulletin-boards and dead walls of the city, that "Mark Twain," The Californian humorist, and the great Historiographer of the Sandwich Islands, proposes to deliver a lecture upon the agriculture, religion, and social characteristics of said Islands, on Tuesday evening next. Judging from the numerous applications for tickets that have been made at THE CALIFORNIAN office during the past two days, "Mark" will have an overflowing audience. In his advertisement, "Mark" says "the trouble" will commence at eight o'clock. Our "trouble," however, has already commenced—in the shape of an overwhelming rush for tickets, the demand for which was yesterday so pressing, as to interfere seriously with the regular routine of our office duties. Those wishing to secure seats for the occasion, can apply at the Academy of Music at any time after nine o'clock on Monday morning.

THE ANATOMICAL MUSEUM, at Eureka Hall, Montgomery street, is one of the most complete institutions of its kind on this coast. All the models and charts are, in fact, similar to those of the anatomical institutions in Paris, London, and New York. The evening lectures, by Dr. Jordan, are exceedingly interesting, and impart much knowledge in the secrets of anatomy that every man should know.

DIDN'T THEY LIVE?—The excavations of Pompeii are going on with an activity stimulated by the important discoveries made at almost every step, and the quantities of gold and silver found, which more than suffice to cover the cost of the works. Near the temple of Juno, of which an account was recently given, has been brought to light a house belonging to some millionaire of the time, as the furniture is of ivory, bronze and marble. The couches of the trinclinium, or dining room, are especially of extreme richness. The flooring consists of immense mosaics, well preserved in parts, of which the center represents a table laid out for a grand dinner. In the middle, on a dish, may be seen a splendid peacock, with its tail spread out, and placed back to back with another bird, also of beautiful plumage. Around them are placed lobsters, one of which holds a blue egg in its claw; a second an oyster, which appears to be fricassed, as it is open and covered with herbs; a third a rat farci, and a fourth a small vase filled with fried grashoppers. Next comes a circle of dishes of fish, interspersed with others of partridges, hares and squirrels, which all have their heads placed between their fore feet. Then comes a row of sausages of all forms, supported by one of eggs, oysters and olives, which in its turn is surrounded by a double circle of peaches, cherries, melons and other fruits and vegetables. The walls of the trinclinium are covered with fresco paintings of birds, fruits, flowers, game, and fish of all kinds, the whole interspersed with drawings which lend a charm to the whole not easy to describe. On a table of rare wood, carved and inlaid with gold marble, agate and lapis lazuli, were found amphoræ still containing wine, and some goblets of onyx.

JUDGING FROM APPEARANCES.—It is all very well to say "don't judge from appearances:" but in emergencies that preclude the investigation of facts, appearances are sometimes the only basis upon which to found an opinion or a decision. For instance, in cases where there is neither time nor opportunity to ascertain the anteeedents of applicants too employment, it is necessary to judge them by the eye; and the eye of a shrewd, observant man is rarely at fault under such circumstances. The theory that appearances are generally fallacious, is in itself a fallacy. When we see a fellow with a face like a bull-dog, we know very well he is not a philanthropist. Napoleon held that firmness and courage were indicated by a large, well formed nose, and that military genius were never the concomitant of a snub. Examine the protraits of the world's great captains, from the era of Julius Cæsar down to that of Wellington, and you will find Napoleon's dictum correct.

WATERFALL HIGHER THAN YO-SEMITE.—The Union Democrat says a waterfall has been discovered on the South Fork of the Tuolumne which exceeds Yo Semite in height by some seven hundred feet: "The Yo-Semite fall—at least the perpendicular fall—is stated, we believe, at thirteen hundred feet, while this fall of water on the Tuolumne is given at two thousand feet. Dr. King and Mr. Gardiner, under the direction of Professor Whitney, the State Geolgist, have been exploring the section of country watered by the Tuolumne River and branches, and made the discovery of this fall. The gentlemen visited Sonora the other day, and, after remaining a day or two, returned to the falls, where they intend to make a complete survey. The country is described as beautiful, and the valley where the falls are situated enchanting."

MONTESQUIEU was discussing a question with a counsellor of the Parliament of Bordeaux, who was witty, but rather hot-headed The latter, concluding some fiery remarks, said: "Mr. President, if this is not as I tell you, I will give you my head." "I accept it," replied Montesquieu, coolly; "small presents keep up friendship."

THE LIBERALS VICTORIES.—Late Mexican news is very favorable to the Liberal or National Party in Sonora; they having taken possession of Hermosillo and Guaymas, and defeated the Imperialists and French in a severe action on the outskirts of Mazatlan.

NEW MUSIC.—We are indebted to Mr. Gray, No. 613 Clay street, for the "Three Guardsmen Waltz;" and the songs "When the pale moon arose last night;" "Violets under the Snow;" and Billy Birch's new song, "O, would I were a Fly."

THE word "shanty," now so much used in our daily conversation, is a corruption of the French noun chiente—a dog kennel.

A FAIR for the benefit of St. James' Church will open at Platt's Hall on Monday evening next.

GERMAN STUDENT LIFE.—Mr. G. M. Towle, United States Consul at Nantes, contributes to Hours at Home a pleasant sketch of "Student Life in Germany," as seen at Heidelberg:

The well fed indolent, sauntering, German "boy," awakens interest soon as one sees him, his manner and dress are so entirely in contrast with our American undergraduates. Let me describe, as nearly as I can, the German student as he appears to stranger eyes—one of a straggling group, sauntering up High street. He is large built, rather stout, and very heavy, both in countenence and gait; his face is large and square, with an expression indicative of good living and much beer; his hair, of a dullish brown color, is cropped closely to the head; upon the side of the skull rests a small round cap, richly embroidered in gold and silver cord and vari-colored, attached to the head by a small elastic behind—this is the cap of the society to which the student belongs; a square plump body, with short thick arms and large hands and feet; enveloped usually in a frock, inexpressibles of the most fashionable color and cut, and high, heavy boots, apparent to the knees; upon his face many scars and little strips of plaster crossing each other—badges of honor these, won in the famous duels of which I shall speak in another paper; in his mouth a long pipe of porcelain; upon which is depicted some super—graceful beauty, a society device, or a representation of the grand old castle, rearing itself above the town, the stem of a shape like a swan's neck, and a bowl of large capacity; in his hand a small cane, or rather stick, for it is too short to be used as a cane, with some fanciful oddity as a handle; and by his side, running anon between his heels, a small, blear-eyed, enormous-headed, blood-thirsty looking bull dog, dearer to his master than women, pipe, I had almost said beer; a sort of lazy swagger in his gait, a usually good humored expession, a very loud laugh, a want of care in his toilet, and a tout ensemble which indicates a life of indolence and pleasure. There are, to be sure, studious-looking men, abstemious men, quick, active men, and men whose dress betrays a limited purse, and whose solitude betokens their ostracism from the convivial student clubs, and the bonds which bind large circles of friends. But I have described the common type of the German student, as far as externals go, the student who goes to the University with competent means, and follows his native and the fashionable inclination.

DISCLAIMS PERSONALITIES.—By the following article, clipped from the Call, it will be seen that the doctors are having a controversy. To the old time query, "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" we can only say the public: "The antagonism between the only scientific method of treating disease, (the Water Cure), and that known as the "regular," or allopathic system, necessarily involves such keen enlistment of feeling, that it is almost a miracle if acrimonious feelings are not engendered in the conflict for the establishment of the one and the maintenance of the position of the other. But the Water Cure Doctor, Bourne, ignores all personal resentments in denouncing medical practice; for among its professors are many gentlemen whom he honors, while he deplores the infatuation which induces them to continue to administer poisons to the sick and suffering; yet his private friendships may not he allowed to interpose a barrier to the duty he owes to himself as an enlightened practitioner of Water Cure, to advance its claims and to contrast its simplicity, adaptation to the requirements of Nature, and unfailing certainty in action, with the means employed and philosophy of medical practice. If he owed not this duty to himself, it is none the less a duty to the public, and if severity is sometimes exhibited, it is because severity is demanded. In warring against the wrongs, the crimes, and ignorance of medicine, in the language of another, he "will be as radical as Righteousness, ultra as the Ten Commandments, uncompromising as Truth." And unquestionably true it will he, that he must say many things which will appear harsh, though he never will be unjust. The object is medical reform.

NEW INSURANCE COMPANY.—The "Builders' Insurance" is the name of a new Company, whose articles of incorporation were filed on Friday. The incorporators are: Thomas Mooney, Samuel Crim, Nathaniel Page, John Center, Frank McCoppin, John Dunn, W. G. Weir, J. W. McCormuck, A. Rosenfield, J. D. Connell, W. A. Janke, Charles B. Grant, Wm. B. Cooke. W. G. Gladwin, D. Jordan, etc. The capital is $50,000, in 500 scares of $100 each. The business is to be carried on in the house of the California Building and Loan Society, in the rear of which a new office for that purpose is being built.

WATER CURE.—The Pioneer, and only Water Cure in San Francisco, Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. Dr. Bourne is probably the oldest water cure physician in the United States, and being pre-eminently practical, has improved the methods of treatment so much, that his system is ten, or perhaps an hundredfold more efficacious than the Eastern and European modes. One thing is certain, Dr. Bourne is the only water cure physician whom the people of this coast have sustained in San Francisco, or anywhere else on this coast, permanently, during fourteen years.

DIARRHŒA, Dysentery, Cholera Morbus—in fact, all intestinal and abdominal diseases—are cured without medicines, and with greater certainty and rapidity than with them, leaving no disastrous consequences as a balance against the future, as is too often the case in medical practice. This style of treatment is only practised in San Francisco by Dr. Bourne. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

LADIES—HOW TO DRAW THEM.—A beautiful complexion and perfect head of hair are charms that attract gentlemen, as blossoms draw the bees. Use Davidson's Circassian Bloom of Youth, and Davidson's Arabian Hair Dressing.

CURES GUARANTEED of Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Paralysis, (generally,) Fever and Ague, and all nervous afflictions, by Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

HOPE.

WE speak with the lip, and we dream in the soul
Of some better and fairer day;
And our days, the meanwhile, to that golden goal
Are gliding and sliding away.
Now the world becomes old, now again it is young,
But "The Better's" forever the word on the tongue.

At the threshold of life bright Hope leads us in—
Hope plays around the mirthful boy;
Though the best of its charms may with youth begin,
Yet for age it reserves its toy.
When we sink at the grave, why, the grave has scope,
And over the coffin man planteth—HOPE!

And it is not a dream of vain fancy proud,
With a fool for its dull begetter;
There's a voice at the heart that proclaims aloud,
"We are born for something better!"
And that voice of the heart, oh, ye may surely believe,
Will never the hope of the soul deceive! —Schiller.

AN INSIDE VIEW OF THE EVACUATION OF RICHMOND.*

[From Pollard's new work, The Lost Cause; an "Official Southern History of the War," we clip the following sketches of the scenes at Richmond previous to, and during the evacuation. There have been scores of accounts published of the events occurring at the time our army entered Richmond, but, we believe, this is the first detailed inside view of its evacuation ever published:]

THE THREE DAYS BEFORE THE EVACUATION.

"IT is a most remarkable circumstance that the people of Richmond had remained in profound ignorance of the fighting which had been taking place for three days on Gen. Lee's lines. There was not a rumor of it in the air. Not a newspaper office in the city had any inkling of what was going on. Indeed for the past few days there had been visible re-assurance in the Confederate Capital; there were rumors that Johnston was moving to Lee's lines, and a general idea that the combined force would take the offensive against the enemy. But a day before Grant had commenced his heavy movement, a curious excitement had taken place in Richmond. The morning train brought from Petersburg a wonderful rumor that Gen. Lee had made a night attack, in which he had crushed the enemy along his whole line. John M. Daniel, the editor of the Richmond Examiner, died the same day under the delusion that such a victory had been won; and John Mitchell, who wrote his obituary in the morning papers, expressed the regret that the great Virginian had passed away just as a decisive victory was likely to give the turning point to the success of the Southern Confederacy! This circumstance shows how little prepared the people of Richmond were on the bright Sabbath of the 2d of April for the news that fell upon them like a thunder-clap from clear skies, and smote the ears of the community like a knell of death."

THE FATAL NEWS.

"A small slip of paper sent up from the War Department to President Davis, as he was seated in his pew in St. Paul's Church, contained the news of the most momentous event of the war.

"The report of a great misfortune traverses a city without the aid of printed bulletins. But that of the evacuation of Richmond fell upon many incredulous ears. One could see the quiet streets stretching away, unmolested by one single sign of war; everything which met the eye spoke of peace. There were but a few people in the streets; no vehicles disturbed the quiet of the Sabbath; the sound of the church bells rose into the cloudless sky, and floated on the blue tide of the beautiful day. How was it possible to imagine that in the next twenty-four hours war, with its train of horrors, was to enter the scene; that this peaceful city, a secure possession for four years, was at last to succumb; that it was to be a prey to a great conflagration, and that all the hopes of the Southern Confederacy were to be consumed in one day, as a scroll, in the fire!

"As the day wore on, clatter and bustle in the streets denoted the progress of the evacuation, and convinced those who had been incredulous of its reality. The disorder increased each hour. The streets were thronged with fugitives making their way to the railroad depots; pale women and little shoeless children struggled in the crowd; oaths and blasphemous shouts smote the ear; wagons were being hastily loaded at the Department with boxes, trunks, etc., and driven to the Danville depot. In the afternoon a special train carried from Richmond President Davis and some of his Cabinet. At the Department all was confusion; there was no system; there was no answer to inquiries; important officers were invisible, and every one felt like taking care of himself. Outside the mass of hurrying fugitives, there were collected here and there mean visaged crowds, generally around the commissary depots; they were of that brutal and riotous element that revenges itself on all communities in a time of great public misfortune."

PILLAGING AND DESTRUCTION.

"When it was finally announced by the Mayor that those who had hoped for a dispatch from Gen. Lee, contrary to what he had telegraphed in the morning, ceased to indulge such an expectation, and that the evacuation of Richmond was a foregone conclusion, it was proposed to maintain order in the city by two regiments of militia; to destroy every drop of liquor in the warehouses and stores; and to establish a patrol through the night. But the militia ran through the fingers of their officers; the patrols could not be seen after a certain hour; and in a short time the city was plunged into mad confusion, and indescribable horrors.

"It was an extraordinary night; disorder, shouts, pillage, and mad revelry of confusion. In the now dimly lighted city could be seen black masses of people, crowded around some object of excitement, besieging the commissary stores, destroying liquor, intent perhaps upon pillage and swaying to and fro in whatever momentary passion possessed them. The gutters ran with a liquor freshet and the fumes filled the air. Some of the straggling soldiers passing through the city managed to get hold of quantities of the liquor. Confusion became more confounded; the sidewalks were filled with broken glass; stores were entered at pleasure and stripped from top to bottom; yells of drunken men filled the air and made the night hideous.

"But a new horror was to appear upon the scene and take possession of the community. To the rear-guard of the Confederate force on the north side of the James river under Gen. Ewell had been left the duty of blowing up the iron-clad vessels in the James and destroying the bridges across the river The Richmond, Virginia, and an iron ram were blown to the winds; the little shipping at the wharves was fired, and the three bridges that spanned the river were wrapped in flames as soon as the last troops had traversed them."

THE BURNING OF RICHMOND.

"The work of destruction might well have ended here. But General Ewell, obeying the letter of his instructions had issued orders to fire the four principal tobacco warehouses of the city; one of them—the Shockee warehouse—situated near the centre of the city, side by side with the Gallego flour mills, just in a position and circumstances from which a conflagration might extend to the whole business portion of Richmond. In vain Mayor Mayo and a committee of citizens had remonstrated against this reckless military order. The warehouses were fired; the flames seized on the neighboring buildings, and soon involved a wide and widening area: the conflagration passed rapidly beyond control; and this mad fire, this wild, unnecessary destruction of their property, the citizens of Richmond had a fitting souvenir, of the imprudence and recklessness of the departing administration.

"Morning broke on a scene never to be forgotten. It was a strange picture—impossible to describe—the smoke and glare of fire mingled with golden beams of the rising sun. The great warehouse of the basin was wrapped in flames; the fire was reaching to the whole blocks of buildings; and as the smoke rose majestically above the horizon, it burnished the fringe of smoke with lurid and golden glory. Curious crowds watched the fire. Its roar sounded in the ears; it leaped from street to street; pillagers were busy at their vocation and in the hot breath of the fire were figures as of demons contending for prey.

THE FORTY "YANKEES" WHO TOOK RICHMOND.

"The sun was an hour or more above the horizon, when suddenly there ran up the whole length of Main street the cry of "Yankees!" "Yankees!" The upper part of this street was choked with crowds of pillagers—men provided with drays, others rolling barrels up the street, or bending under heavy burdens, and intermixed with them women and children with smaller lots of plunder in bags, baskets, tubs, buckets, and tin pans. As the cry of "Yankees" was raised, this motley cry-crowd tore up the street, cursing, screaming, trampling upon each other, alarmed by an enemy not yet in sight, and madly seeking to extricate themselves from imaginary danger. Presently, beyond this crowd, following up the tangled mass of plunderers, but not pressing or interfering with them, was seen a small body of Federal cavalry, riding steadily along. Forty Massachusetts troopers, dispatched by Gen. Weitzel, to investigate the condition of affairs, had ridden without hindrance into Richmond. At the corner of Eleventh street they broke into a trot for the public square, and in a few moments their guidons were planted on the Capitol, and fluttered a strange spectacle in the early morning light."

ENTRANCE OF THE UNION ARMY.

"A few hours thereafter, and Weitzel's troops were pouring through the streets of the city. A lady, who witnessed the grand Federal entree, and has given a very graphic account of it, thus describes a portion of the scene: 'Stretching from the Exchange Hotel to the slopes of Church Hill, down the hill, through the valley, up the ascent to the hotel, was the array, with its unbroken line of blue, fringed with bright bayonets. Strains of martial music, flushed countenances, waving of swords betokened the victorious army. As the line turned at the Exchange Hotel into the Upper street, the movements were the signal for a wild burst of cheers from each regiment. Shouts from a few negroes were the only responses. Through throngs of sullen spectators; along the fire line; in the midst of the horrors of conflagration, increased by the explosion of shells left by the retreating army; through the vast aerial auditorium convulsed with the commotion of frightful sounds, moved the garish procession of the grand army, with brave music, and bright banners, and wild cheers. A regiment of negro cavalry swept by the hotel. As they turned the street corner they drew their sabres with savage shouts, and the blood mounted even in my woman's heart with quick throbs of defiance.'

"Meanwhile the fire raged with unchecked fury. The entire business part of the city was on fire; stores, warehouses, manufactories, mills, depots, and bridges—all, covering acres; the continuous thunder of exploding shells sounded in the sea of fire; and in the midst of it was the long, threatening, hostile army entering to seize its prey. All during the forenoon, flame, and smoke, and burning brands, and showers of blazing sparks filled the air, spreading still further the destruction, until it had swept before it every bank, every auction store, every insurance office, nearly every commission house, and most of the fashionable stores. The atmosphere was choking; men, women, and children crowded into the square of the Capitol for a breath of pure air; but it was not to be obtained even there, and one traversed the green slopes blinded by the cinders and struggling for breath. Already, piles of furniture had been collected here, dragged from the ruins of burning houses; and in uncouth arrangements, made with broken tables and bureaus, were huddled women and children, with no other resting place in Heaven's great hollowness.

"Some tardy attempts were made to arrest the conflagration; in the afternoon the crowd of negroes organized as a fire corps; but the five steam engines that played upon the flames were not sufficient to check their progress. It was late in the evening when the fire had burned itself out. It had consumed the most important part of Richmond. The pencil of the surveyor could not have marked out more distinctly the business portion of the city."

QUIET AND REST.

"The evening breezes had turned the course of the fire; and as these still continued, heavy mist clouds hung upon the horizon, or streamed upwards in the varying current of the winds. As night came on, there was a painful reaction after the day's terrible excitement; a strange quiet fell upon the blackened city and its scenes of destruction. It was the quiet of a great desolation. Groups of women and children crawled under shelter of broken furniture in the Capitol square; hundreds of homeless persons laid down to sleep in the shadows of the ruins of Richmond; and worn out by excitement, exhausted as by the excitement of a great battle, men watched for the more row with the dull sense that the work of years had been ruined, and that all that they possessed on earth had been swept away.

THE PHENOMENA OF THE BRAIN.—One of the most inconceivable things in the nature of the brain is, that, although the organ of sensation, it should itself be insensible. To cut the brain gives no pain; yet in the brain resides the power of feeling pain in any part of the body. If the nerve which leads to it from the injured part be divided, we become instantly unconscious of suffering. It is only by communication with the brain that any kind of sensation is produced; yet the organ itself insensible. But there is a circumstance more wonderful still. A certain portion of the brain itself may be removed without destroying life. The animal lives and performs all those functions which are necessary to simple vitality, but it has no longer a mind; it cannot think or feel. It requires that the food should be pushed into its stomach; once there, it is digested, and the animal will even thrive and grow fat. We infer, therefore, that a part of the brain is simply intended for the exercise of the intellectual faculties, whether of the lower degree, called instinct, or of that exalted kind bestowed on man, termed reason.

JUDGING CHARACTER BY THE COLOR OF A PETTICOAT.—The following is from the pen of a man who "loved not wisely, but too well," and got married:

The way to judge of a woman's character, at first sight, is to ascertain the color of her petticoat. A black petticoat indicates low spirits, a hatred of washtubs and activity, and a taste for dyspeptic literature and quietude. A lady who wears a black petticoat, could no more read and understand this paragraph, than she could swim the Atlantic.

A white petticoat shows a character just the opposite—an unsullied mind and a taste for romance. A woman who takes naturally to white petticoats and never wears any other, is an institution to which young gentlemen of connubial proclivities should lose no time in paying due attention.

The red petticoat, however, is something of which mankind should beware; it is the insigna of Xantippes—a style of females, who cut their toe-nails with their husbands' razors.

RURAL DELIGHTS.

AT this time of the year, everybody with the slightest love of nature persuades himself that, if he were master of circumstances, he would never live anywhere but in the country. And a great many people amuse themselves by trying to think seriously that by and by they are going to take a place in the country, and by picturing to themselves all its perfections and delights. They have exquisite visions of croquet-lawns, and delicious borders of flowers, and of the poetic cow and homely pig in the background. They think how glorious it must be to feel the scents of the garden, and to hear the singing of the birds through one's bedroom window on getting up in the morning, and to watch the moon rise over the tree tops as one goes to bed at night.

The intention of living in the country is, with nine out of the ten people who entertain it, a sheer delusion. They are quite honest, and have fully convinced themselves that they can only lead the ideal life among the green fields and the little birds and the vegetables. Still at bottom there is a lurking fear that after all they might find the country somewhat less of a paradise than they love to think it. And they are perfectly right, for nature, with her usual fondness for compensation, has put some rather heavy drawbacks into the scale against the delights of the fields. For example, the country is a very trying place for ladies. One of the chief delights of living in the country, to people accustomed to towns, is its roominess. You have a large flower-garden, and a large kitchen-garden, and airy meadows, and unnumbered out-houses and offices which, though of no particular use to speak of, fill the mind with a sense of spaciousness and overflowing accommodation.

Then there are spreading trees at the back of the house, and breezy downs in front, and you are at least half a dozen miles from the nearest country town. All this gives one a noble feeling of freedom and expansiveness, and a notion that you are leading the life according to nature, which is quite true; only married ladies and grown-up daughters are not always clear, after a little experience, that the life according to nature is the pleasantest sort of life. For this admirable roominess implies that you are without neighbors, and women without neighbors are generally creatures of stunted lives. Neighbors are to them what his amusements and his profession and his newspaper are to one of the so-called stronger sex. It is all very well for the gentleman who is writing a great and immortal book, or for one who goes up to business every morning and comes down again at night, and who in truth has Sunday only to spend in his Paradise. But ordinary ladies do not write great books and they have nothing to do all the solid day except a little gardening and novel-reading and piano-playing, and perhaps occasionally writing letters to friends in town containing ecstatic accounts of the delights of the country.

In all the nonsense that lovers talk, there is nothing so common or so nonsensical as the resolution that when they are married they will live in some charming nest far remote from the busy haunts of men. The truth is that a young married woman is just the last person in the world who ought to be left neighborless. Accustomed all her life to the pleasant talk of her mother, and the stimulating disputatiousness of her younger sisters, she is utterly lonely as soon as her lord gets back again into his groove of work which he has temporarily left for the purposes of the honeymoon. The charming nest becomes a very palace of boredom and weariness, and she may even find herself committing the monstrous crime of half-wishing herself at home again among the polite wranglings of her unmarried sisters, who at all events kept her from being dull. It is very charming to think of the moon rising over the tree tops, but the moon does not rise over the tree tops in the daytime; and the scent of flowers, however delicious in itself, does not count for friends and companions. Even breezy downs and woods will not make up for lack of human voices. It is not everybody who has such a passion for nature as to be able to make friends with a great black down, or a forest of oaks, or a clump of high-standing beeches. There are people who can strike up companionships of this sort with every inanimate object, from the wide sea down to the daisy nodding its head in the sun, but such people are not very numerous. To be able to feel this friendship for objects that make no articulate response is exclusively the mark of the poetic nature, and young ladies, though ready to compose any number of the sweetest verses, are at the bottom thoroughly prosaic.

Men, like women, do not always find life in the country so perfectly blissful as they supposed. The gardener is a sore tribulation, and an irremovable thorn in the flesh. The graceful contempt with which he treats any suggestion you may be bold enough to make about your own wishes respecting your own garden, the compassionate smile with which he listens to any notion you may have got from a horticultural treatise, the rapidity with which he demolishes any disposition on the part of his employer to give himself any little ais—in short, all the characteristics of a superior person, help to make the garden less a delight than a place of torment. The only plan for getting any peace and comfort out of your garden is to surrender it gracefully and without contention, and the gardener will prove a very affable man. Then, just as the gardener is so very much too good, the other men in the place are very much too bad. The village joiner, the plumber, the plasterer, the man who has a vague and altogether fictious reputation for "doing things" about the house and the stable—these exasperate you as much by their vices as the gentleman in the hot-house by his abominable virtue.

One of the greatest charms about a country house is that there is always something which wants doing. The master of the house is kept in a steady-flowing stream of excitement about little repairs. Pipes, cisterns, tanks, drains, flues, furnish a never-ending pretext for invasions of torpid masons and plumbers. As soon as the smoke has been persuaded to go peaceably up the chimney, the water refuses to flow into the tank, or else it refuses to flow out of the tank except by taking the newly-papered drawing-room wall en route. When the mason is sent for, you learn that, like Balbus in the exercise-book, he is building a house with his own hand, six miles off; or else, like Balbus's friend Caius, he has gone to the city for the sake of buying. Then you have moles in your meadow, and rats in your hay-stack, and you have the pleasures of seeing the little mounds in the one and the little holes in the other go on rapidly increasing for days and days until it suits the good pleasure of the man who "does things" to bring his mole-traps and his ferrets.

Then, again, bills are a great trouble, not from their amount, but from their impenetrable intricacy. Why should one find put all in one line a man's labor for a day and a quarter, four pounds of green paint, and three feet of half-inch board, in all amounting to seven shillings and eightpence? How is a plain man to disentangle a statement of this sort, so as to know how much he pays for green paint, how much for the half-inch board, and how much for the day and quarter of the man—whom, by the way, he only remembers to have seen at work for a couple of hours one afternoon? Of course it is impossible, and all payments of this sort must be made simply on the strength of faith. This is evidently a very unpleasant principle for people with a financial mind. Still the plain man may console himself that at least he gets all his vegetables for nothing. But it is ten to one that he will one day unluckily make this vaunt to some cold-hearted political economist from this city, who will ruthlessly prove to him that each stick of asparagus costs him on an average about eightpence, each cucumber several shillings, and so on in proportion down to the humblest vegetable that grows.

It is not to be denied that rural life, in those who are only trying their 'prentice hands at it, tends to develop the virtue of hospitality to a very high degree of perfection indeed. Perhaps it would be truer to say that it develops one half of it, and makes us more eager to welcome the coming than to speed the parting guest. Nobody is ever so welcome in town as the man who comes down to a country place laden with papers and all sorts of gossip. If we used to find him dull and commonplace, his character and conversation have now about them an unequalled savor and piquancy. If he used to be a chattering bore, he is now the most amusing and instructive of companions.

Yet, for all this, for people with sufficient force of character (and of a certain kind of character) to be able to live a great deal upon their own resources, the country is by far the most congenial home. They find all sorts of new sympathies arise, and their whole sense of the companionship of nature is at once quickened and gratified. The very monotony of dark heaths and green fields and hedgerows is imposing, and it is the more imposing to a man who learns the infinite change of growth and color and form which is constantly at work under this seeming monotony. Every process of nature, from the slow stately progress of masses of cloud down to the fierce contests of the tiny adders on a pond edge, and the battles of insects in the sun, becomes interesting and suggestive, and a man of a certain sort possitively luxuriates in the contemplation of the incessant life and growth and decay about him. This consciousness of neverending movement around him far more than compensates for the minute vexations incident to life in places where the civilized organization of town has not reached. But then people of another sort find the vexations far weightier than the joys, and they only think that a man must be an idiot for preferring partially uncomfortable isolation to the life of the city. So he would be if he were like themselves.—Saturday Review.

THAT a man should be just and respectful toward all mankind, he must first begin with himself. A man—so to speak—who is not able to make a bow to his own conscience every morning, is hardly in a condition to respectfully salute the world at any other time of the day.

A PRETTY word to look at. The news from the minor German States is given in the journals of Fatherland under the following simple heading: "Mitteleuropaischestaatenpruppe."

LOVE is of the nature of a burning-glass, which kept still in one place, burns; changed often, it is powerless.

ROMANCE VS. REALITY.

AFTER TENNYSON WITH A SHARP STICK.

PREFACE.

THE only excuse the author can offer his readers for the rough manners and rougher morals of the characters in the following story is to be found in the fact that as he is not a poet laureate, like Tennyson, he cannot call to his aid any poetic license to justify him in giving all the fine feelings and manners of highly-educated people to an unsophisticated village girl, like Annie Lee, a rough sailor's lad, like Enoch Arden, and a miller's only son, like Philip Ray. The author flatters himself, however, that his characters are drawn closer to the life than are those of the poet Tennyson.

CHAPTER I.

THIRTY years ago three children sat making mud pies in an unfrequented street in the village of Harlem. E. Nocharden, the one with the streak of molasses candy stretching from ear to ear, is a gin mill keeper's only son; Philip Ray, the one with the bark peeled from his nose, is a rough tailor's lad; and Ann Neily, the girl with the bare feet and dirty face, is the only daughter of a peanut and apple merchant who keeps his stand on a neighboring corner, "by permission of the Common Council."

"I'm boss to-day," said E. Nocharden, as he took a seat in the centre of the mud pie, regardless of the effect such a movement would produce on his gushing linen.

"No ye ain't," cried master Ray, as he flung a handful of soft mud in his antagonist's face, half of it going down his mouth, and the other completely stopping up those little apertures called eyes.

A scrimmage followed; much hair was pulled; various scratches were given, and the two combatants went home crying to tell their mothers.

Finally Ann Neily secured peace by giving each a stick of candy which she purloined from her father's stand while that gentleman was taking a nap.

CHAPTER II.

IN WHICH JOHNNY GOETH FOR A SOLDIER.

TWENTY years have passed, and we find E. Nocharden and Philip Ray suitors for Ann Neily's hand. The girl loves E. Nocharden, but lest anything should turn up that might deprive her of him, keeps Philip Ray hanging on, by seeming kinder unto him. This frightens E. Nocharden into popping the question, and they are wed. As Philip Ray hears the wedding bells he swears on his father's goose that he will have revenge for her treachery. The war for the Union breaks out; the Internal Revenue officers confiscate E. Nocharden's "mill" for dealing in contraband whisky; and, in order to get a living for his family, E. Nocharden, at his wife's suggestion, takes the bounty and goes for a soldier. Before going he fits up an apple-stand for his wife regardless of expense.

CHAPTER III.

ESTABLISHES THE FACT THAT ONE PRESENT HUSBAND IS WORTH TWO ABSENT ONES.

THE soldier had no sooner departed than his wife became lonesome, and silently wished for a partner. Just at that particular moment Philip Ray, the tailor's son, who had in the meantime become wealthy by manufacturing shoddy clothing, thought his time for revenge had come. He offered her his aid, accordingly. She accepted it. He visited her often and long. She appeared to like it. On one occasion he remained very late. The neighbors gossiped strangely about it and shook their heads ominously. She grew angry at her neighbors, and said she would do as she pleased. She did so; which suited Philip Ray to a T.

CHAPTER IV.

"WHOSE BEEN HERE SINCE I'SE BEEN GONE?"

THREE years from the time of E. Nocharden's enlistment had passed, and on a warm summer's evening in August, a weary soldier with bronzed features and battle-stained uniform was seen approaching E. Nocharden's house.

It was E. Nocharden, returned from the war.

He had given his wife no notice of his return, because he thought it would be nice to surprise her.

He neared the house, and preparatory to entering took a peep in at the window.

Death and furies, what was it he saw—his wife in the embrace of his rival, Philip Ray, with their lips glued together.

With the desperation of a maniac, and without a moment's delay, he rushed for the door, and bounded into the room.

The weather being too warm to follow him, dear reader, let us remain outside.

CHAPTER V.

A SOLDIER OF THE UNION IS IN FAVOR OF DISUNION.

THE morning paper next day contained the following in the police intelligence:

"Before Police Justice Smith, yesterday, a man named Ray made a charge of assault and battery against a returned soldier named E. Nocharden, when, upon trial, it turned out that the defendant found the plaintiff infringing on his marital rights, and administered to him a dose of correction in the shape of two black eyes and two damaged front teeth. The judge dismissed the complaint on the ground that it 'served the plaintiff right.'"

In the advertising columns of the same paper appeared the following:

NOTICE!—All persons are hereby warned against trusting or harboring my wife, ANN, on my account, as I will not be responsible for any debts contracted by her after this date. E. NOCHARDEN.

"BLACK SHEEP," a new story by Edmund Yates, now publishing in Charles Dickens' Magazine, will be commenced in the next number of THE CALIFORNIAN. Edmund Yates is the author of "Land at Last," and other popular novels, and the fact that Charles Dickens has chosen him out of the entire field of popular English writers to furnish the leading serial for his magazine, All the Year Round, is alone a sufficient guarantee of his superiorty as a writer, and an undeniable voucher for the ability and quality of the coming story.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"SNAP SMITH'S DOG" has been received and is under advisement. It has excellent points, but could be "cut" to advantage.

JUNO AND JUPITER, by "Œnone," has come to hand, but has not yet been passed upon.

THE POEM entitled "Egeria" is respectfully declined. The author can obtain the MS. by calling at THE CALIFORIAN OFFICE.

"E. N."—The burlesque of Dr. S——, is a decidedly clever performance, but we have come to the conclusion that that vein is worked out.

CALIFORNIA HOMES.

GENTLEMEN who come from the East to "do" California and then hurry back to publish a book embodying the results of their observations and experiences, are wont for the most part to speak indulgently of our present, and hopefully of our future social condition.

They, however, generally agree in noting among its existing characteristics, the materialistic spirit that pervades our society, and the comparative feebleness of that home feeling, and of those family ties which acquire depth and strength in older communities. An absence of sentiment among our women and young people, and a disposition among all classes to decide every question of worth, value, and desirableness by reference to a pecuniary, or a bald utilitarian standard, are also prominent topics of remark with these observers from abroad.

As to the alleged comparative weakness of home feeling and of the ties of kindred among us, we suspect that men who have passed the middle age of life are liable to see indications of this kind through the illusory haze of their own feelings. Elderly people are apt to think the world has changed, when the change is in themselves. Instances are by no means infrequent of the same species of complaints and lamentations in regard to society at the East on the part of Californians returning after a long absence to their early homes. Hawthorne predicted the decadence of "homes" as a consequence of the general substitution of air-tight stoves for the old-fashioned fire-place, arguing that homes without hearths were an impossibility. It seems, at any rate, to be certain that the family sentiment and the feeling of kindred are generally stronger in cold countries than in warm ones. A comparison of the poetry and fictitious literature of Germany and the north of Europe with that of the Southern nations will strikingly illustrate this. Family pictures and family ties form a large element in the legends and tales of the Germanic and Scandinavian races, while in those of the South, passion and gallantry predominate almost to the exclusion of other elements. Certainly a rigorous climate, that during a great portion of the year keeps the household together, and gathers it around the fireside in the long nights of winter, would seem a priori more favorable to the strengthening of family ties and the development of the sentiment of home than one so mild and genial as to make it not only practicable but pleasant to pass the greater part of the time not devoted to sleep in the open air.

As to the alleged materialistic tendency in California society, the disposition to refer the decision of questions of relative values to a pecuniary standard, to base social distinctions upon wealth or occupation, these things undoubtedly exist; but are they confined to California? Are they not rather marked features of the society of nearly all great American cities? Assuredly if the delineations of fashionable life at the East, which we find in the current literature of the day, are to be accepted as at all reliable, Shoddy artistocracy and Brummagem gentility are quite as predominant and influential in New York and the other principal Atlantic cities as in San Francisco.

So far as there is any foundation for the complaints in regard to the absence in California homes of the sweet associations that hallow the word, such complaints have equal force in our generation as applied to American homes generally. The change has come with our departure from simple and primitive modes of life, the introduction of more artificial habits, an increased taste for luxury, and a consequent relaxation in the fashionable code of social morality.

It is a most significant and deplorable fact, that there are entire circles in our existing society in which children in the family are regarded as an incumbrance and an annoyance rather than a comfort and a delight. And this can only be explained by the fact that in such circles the majority of children are undisciplined and spoiled; for assuredly nothing can add more to the charm of a home than the presence of judiciously trained and well bred children. Yet, as a general thing, it must be admitted that in California, (and we do not believe our case to be exceptional in the United States), children in a family are not considered one of the features which make it pleasant as a visiting place. They are more frequently a terror to landlords, a source of continual anxiety and irritation to parents, and an intolerable nuisance to the friends and visitors of the family.

Upon the whole we are inclined to the opinion that notwithstanding the supercedure of broad-mouthed fire-places and back-logs by grates and fenders, there may still be "homes" no less happy and hallowed than in the days of our grandfathers; that they are quite as possible in California as in New York, and that the most formidable obstacle to their realization, is the neglect of firm and wise family discipline on the part of parents, so that children, instead of being the very light and joy of the house, become annoyances and plagues.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL BUGBEAR.

ABSURDITIES are often amusing, and they are sometimes instructive. In the way of a solemn, and at the same time an edifying absurdity, we know of nothing more grotesque than the "arguments" so long current in the partizan press, designed to prove that the Government of the United States was constitutionally bound during the late war to play the part of a non-resistant against treason and rebellion, and so become accessory to its own destruction. It was with the utmost gravity urged as an objection against necessary measures of self-protection, that said measures were "unconstitutional." Rebels who had repudiated the Constitution as binding upon themselves, still held it up as a shield for their own protection, and claimed the right to advance under its secure cover to the attack which was to overthrow both it and the Union, the preservation of which was its sole object. And the unconstitutional war by which the nation was preserved being ended, the same appeal to the Constitution is made for the purpose of preventing a safe and durable reconstruction. Undoubtedly the war for the preservation of the Union was "unconstitutional" in the sense at least that the organic law contains no provision applicable to such a contingency as the attempted secession of a number of Confederated States. In like manner and to the same extent, the act of the man who shoots a highwayman in self-defense is "unlawful," since the statutes fail to set forth the cases in which human life may be lawfully taken, except indirectly and by way of definition of the degrees of crime.

The truth is, that it is quite impossible to make the action of the government, or of any branch of it, either during the war or since its close, square with the strict letter of the Constitution. In this respect the President and Congress are equally guilty, if there is any guilt in the matter. Upon strict theoretical constitutional grounds, the moment the rebel armies surrendered and the Confederate States signified their submission, they were restored to all their rights in the Union —to all their rights as individual States in the control of their own internal affairs, and all their rights as component parts of the United States. From that moment any interference with their domestic polity was unconstitutional, and any delay in admitting them to representation in Congress, or the imposition of any terms as the condition of such admission, was equally unconstitutional. Such was the abstract and theoretical view of the case; a view as palpably monstrous and ineffably absurd in the eye of instinct and common sense, as it would be to insist that a man must allow himself to be knocked down and robbed on the highway without resistance because there is a law against assault and battery.

After the surrender of Lee the President acted unconstitutionally, and without consulting Congress, as the exigencies of the case demanded. But such action was indorsed by the nation, and none but theoretical quibblers objected to it. The President at once assumed, in accordance with the dictates of common sense, that the fact of acknowledged defeat and enforced submission did not at once restore the late rebellious States to all their rights. He assumed that the Government had the power to impose "conditions;" and Congress has claimed no more than this. Hence the difference between Congress and the President, whatever else it may be, is not a constitutional difference. It is a difference of policy, not of principle; of degree, not of kind.

In fact, nothing can possibly be more inconsistent and illogical than the attempt on the part of the President to hold up the Constitutional bugbear for the intimidation of Congress. That scarecrow is the legitimate and exclusive property of those who, with an originality only equalled by their effrontery, claimed the protection of the Constitution which they had repudiated, while they were endeavoring to destroy the national existence which it was the sole use and function of that Constitution to conserve.

"BLACK SHEEP," the new novel by Edmund Yates, which has just been commenced in Dickens' magazine, All the Year Round, opens with far richer promise than Land at Last, by the same author, though the latter found multitudes of delightful readers, and won for Mr. Yates a position among the first novelists of the day. Though Black Sheep, in its first chapter, at once takes a powerful hold upon the reader's interest, and gives promise of being in one sense highly sensational in its character, it may safely be inferred from circumstance of its appearance in such a periodical as All the Year Round, that it will not be "sensational" after the Pierce Egan style. The story opens so powerfully and promises so well, that we have concluded, notwithstanding our general prejudice against the publication of "serials," to furnish it to the readers of THE CALIFORNIAN as fast as it appears, which we shall be able to do in advance of any other periodical on this coast. The first installment of "Black Sheep" will make its appearance in next week's CALIFORNIAN.

A CALIFORNIA RAILROAD HIGH AS THE ALPS.—The California end of the Pacific Railroad will be higher than the Passes of the Alps. The grade at Cisco, ninety-three miles from Sacramento, and fourteen miles from Alta, the present terminus of the passenger trains, is 5,911 feet above the level of the sea, only 315 less than the top of Mount Washington, the highest peak of the White Mountains and the highest land in New England. When the grade reaches the Summit Station, twelve and a half miles from Cisco, it will be 7,042 feet above the level of the ocean, 816 feet higher than the summit of Mount Washington, and higher than all but one of the world-renowned Passes of the Alps. The gigantic character and magnitude of the work necessary to carry the Pacific Railroad across the Sierra Nevada Mountains, the backbone of the American continent, may be readily conceived by the above figures; and must take rank among the most remarkable of all railroad achievements. The elevation reached at Summit Station is much greater than that attained by any other railroad in the world.

[For the Californian.]

ORIGIN OF ILLUSTRIOUS MEN.

YOU have done fair enough about Franklin and Shakspeare, and several parties not so well known—parties some of us never heard of, in fact—but you have shirked the fellows named below. Why this mean partiality?

JOHN SMITH was the son of his father. He formerly resided in New York and other places, but he has moved to San Francisco, now.

WM. SMITH was the son of his mother. This party's grandmother is deceased. She was a brick.

JOHN BROWN was the son of old Brown. The body of the latter lies mould'ring in the grave.

EDWARD BROWN was the son of old Brown by a particular friend.

HENRY JONES was a son of a sea-cook.

WM. JONES was a son of a gun.

JOHN JONES was a Son of Temperance.

In early life GABRIEL JONES was actually a shoemaker. He is a shoemaker yet.

Previous to the age of 85, CALEB JONES had never given any evidence of extraordinary ability. He has never given any since.

PATRICK MURPHY is said to have been of Irish extraction.

JAMES PETERSON was the son of a common weaver, who was so miraculously poor that his friends were encouraged to believe that in case the Scriptures were strictly carried out he would "inherit the earth." He never got his property.

JOHN DAVIS' father was a soap-boiler, and not a very good soap-boiler at that. John never arrived at maturity—died in childbirth, he and his mother.

JOHN JOHNSON was a blacksmith. He died. It was published in the papers, with a head over it, "DEATHS." It was therefore thought he died to gain notoriety. He has got an aunt living somewheres.

Up to the age of 34, HOSEA WILKERSON never had any home but Home, Sweet Home, and even when he had that he had to sing it himself. At one time it was believed that he would have been famous if he had become celebrated. He died. He was greatly esteemed for his many virtues. There was not a dry eye in the crowd when they planted him.

The "Alta's" Literary Critic.

The book-reviewer of the Alta discovers a strong resemblance between a rather commonplace and very diffuse little juvenile book, entitled Timothy Crump's Ward, and Goldsmith's Vicar of Wakefield. There is a classic elegance of style observable in the criticisms of this literary gentleman, and a precision and delicacy of expression that are quite rare in the class of writers to whom the business of reviewing new publications is generally confided. Here is a specimen:

"As a juvenile novel, it is the best that has issued from the press for years. The plot is the history of Ida, a little girl that was kidnapped, and at the end of the book she is only ten years of age. After she had been stolen from her mother, she was placed in charge of Timothy Crump, a cooper, in New York, who knew nothing of her parentage or kidnapping. At the age of nine years, she was stolen from him and carried off to Philadelphia."

It is quite refreshing to encounter a critic of this stamp, one who knows his own mind thoroughly, and who delivers his opinions with oracular decision. He talks like a man who understands his subject. He doesn't go beating about the bush, with qualifying phrases and half meanings, as, "an excellent juvenile," "one of the best that has issued from the press," etc.; nothing at all of this hesitating sort; but he comes out short, sharp, and decisive; "It is the best that has issued from the press for years." That's the style of criticism for a respectable first-class paper; there's no "Bohemianism" about that; no false brilliancy, no effeminate polish, no demoralizing literary frills, no disgusting subserviency to the old-fashioned canons of rhetoric or Syntax. It's the solid style suited to a substantial journal representing substantial interests. It's a style too, that is calculated to command respect. Had the critic merely said that the Crump story was "one of the best," etc., the keen reader might have suspected that he had not read all the stories "that had issued from the press for years," or that he wasn't quite clear and certain in his own mind about the exact relative merits of said stories. Whereas this unhesitating, flat-footed way of putting it, at once compels our respect for an authority whose edicts are announced with such decision. It won't do for any literary person to venture an opinion upon the merits of a new book until he has read the Alta's book notices. It would be the height of presumption to do it. That fellow knows all about literature, as "Mark Twain" does about the Sandwich Islands.

The Sandwich Islands.

The returned missionary, "Mark Twain," is about to deliver a lecture on the scene of his late missionary labors, the Sandwich Islands. This lecture is to be delivered on Tuesday next at the Academy of Music, within one block of which building Emma, Dowager Queen of the Sandwich Islands, is residing. The great question which agitates peoples' minds at present is: "What will 'Mark Twain' say? Will he, to gain the favor of Queen Emma, and with the hope of, by means of her interest, eventually supplanting his deadly enemy, Staly, and becoming Bishop of the Sandwich Islands, give a glowing account of the Islands and their inhabitants, or will he, on the other hand, from a desire to prove his utter hatred, detestation and abhorrence of a monarchical form of government, go to the other extreme and pitch into the Sandwich Islands and Sandwich Islanders?" We believe that "Mark" will take a middle course—we hope he will do so—but he is terribly unreliable. The report that he intends to dance a war dance on the conclusion of his lecture is incorrect—he commenced training but broke down before he brought himself down to the required weight. A number of absurd reports have been set afloat concerning "Mark Twain's" romantic adventures in the Sandwich Islands which will be set at rest by his lecture. He will on Tuesday next at the Academy of Music emphatically contradict the mermaid story which has caused him so much unpleasantness; also, the base fabrication with reference to the waterfall of the Mountain Princess and the other strange stories which have caused him so much annoyance since he has relinquished his missionary labors. We are sorry that "Mar" kdid not engage Union Hall instead of the Academy of Music, as the latter building will probably not accommodate more than half of those who will be anxious to hear him.

The Needle Gun.

The Bulletin one day last week attempted to tell its readers all about the needle gun, but, like a camel who should attempt to go through the eye of a needle, made a blundering attempt. The Bulletin says: "The needle gun was invented by Dr. Rufahl, a German, some eight or ten years ago. In 1860 he offered it to the British Government. It was exhibited and inspected at Woolwich and rejected by the Board of Ordnance."

This is not the case. The needle gun was in use in the Prussian army in 1845, and its efficiency was thoroughly tested in the revolution of 1848. Dr. Rufahl's gun was an attempted improvement on the needle gun. The Bulletin, setting forth the superior advantages of the American made rifles, says: "It is well known that in the armories of the United States arms are manufactured by machinery, upon the plan that every part of every gun shall be precisely like the corresponding part of every other gun; so that when a gun is to be made up the artisan takes the stock in his hand, and walking around picks up the several parts in their order as they are needed, each one of which fits precisely into its place without the touch of a file or any attention whatever, making up the complete arm; so that from a dozen broken and battered rifles gathered up from the field of battle, on the average half a dozen perfect ones can be made up, each as good as new."

This is true, but it is—or should be—equally well known that in the armories of all the nations of Europe, arms are manufactured by machinery, and that the parts are equally well made. The Bulletin should have known that at the present day we cannot pretend to be quite so far ahead of all nations in the world in the manufacture of death-dealing instruments, as it would seem to imply. The great objection to the Spencer rifle, is that it is liable to get out of order in consequence of the spiral spring which pushes forward the cartridges, becoming rusted and thus losing its strength, while the needle gun is always efficient even when it has been allowed to remain exposed to the weather for a considerable length of time. The most sensible paragraph in the article in the Bulletin of Friday, September 21st, headed "The Needle Gun," is the following: "When the truth of history comes to be written, it will probably appear that the Prussians won the battle of Sadowa because they were determined, years ago, upon the secession from the Germanic Confederation, which they have now accomplished; studied the ground; organized their plan of the campaign and chose their own position; and determined to fight the matter out, while Austria supposed that the solution would be reached by a negotiation after a mere display of force."

The fact of the matter is, that the Prussians won the battle by the pluck which they exhibited more than in consequence of a rain setting in which wet the percussion caps of the Austrians.

A Military Outrage.

The daily papers recently published an account of a military outrage perpetrated against a highly respectable citizen of Fort Mojave. The pretext for this arbitrary exercise of authority, was that the injured citizen "kept a rum-mill," and had been "clandestinely furnishing tangle-leg and fighting whisky" to the boys in blue stationed at the Fort. On this shabby pretence the military despot in command in those parts assumed the exercise of "proconsular powers," and ordered the place of business of the respectable citizen to be "cleaned out," which was done. The outraged individual, however, is going to assert his rights and insist upon his legal remedy by an action for damages before a competent tribunal. As a preliminary step he has sent in his bill, of which the following is a copy:

Hippophagy.

Why should San Francisco remain behind the rest of the world? Paris has decided that horse-flesh is delicious food. A French restaurateur has started for London for the purpose of establishing a house for the sale of horse-flesh. Let this subject be agitated in San Francisco. Horse-flesh cannot be tougher than some of our beef. We are a horse-raising and a horse-racing community—let us turn our old stock to some use. If horse-flesh becomes a fashionable article of food the owner of a valuable horse which has become lame, can at least comfort himself with the reflection that he can sell it at so much a pound. Race-horse steaks will become popular at our fashionable restaurants, and sporting gentlemen will eat them as a matter of course. Filly will take the place of filet de veau in the French restaurants, and colt's foot be a more favorite dish than calves' feet. Worn out race-horses will of course be fattened for the market, and will command immense prices, and we may perhaps at some future day see the following notice in a restaurant window: "'Norfolk' porterhouse steaks to day," or, "'Lodi,' or 'Patchen,' roast at 1 o'clock." Then there may arise a notion that horses of one color may be better than those of another. "Piebald pot-pie" might become popular, or roast "chestnut" might be held in high favor by epicures. It is quite evident that if hippophagy become general, the phrase "he is a good judge of horse-flesh" will acquire quite a different signification from that which it possesses at present.

The Good "Times" Coming.

The public of San Francisco are quite determined that they will have a Times newspaper, although the company popularly supposed to have been formed for the purpose of issuing a paper under this title, has not yet issued a prospectus. However; the Times is to be published—in the course of a month or two. To make preparations for the publication of such a paper as the Times is designed to be is no work of a moment. We understand that a new paper is very shortly to be published in London. It is to be called the Stranger in London, and is to be made up in a novel manner. All the news, articles, and information it contains will appear in parallel columns, in three languages—English, French, German.

It is possible that the Times, which the public of San Francisco are expecting so eagerly, may be published in Greek, Hebrew, and Sanscrit. If this be the case, the difficulty attendant on obtaining fonts of these types will explain why the Times does not come out. At present the ungrateful public sneer at the Alta, which they term "dull, old-fogyish, and stupid," and look out anxiously for the good Times coming.

Mrs. Woxcockle on the Union Prayer Meetings.

MR. EDITOR:—I am a churchwoman, and I don't believe in prayer meetings, exceptin' such as where the service is read. Besides, what's the use of bolding "Union Prayer Meetings" (which is what they call 'em) now that the war is over, and the Union is saved? And more than that, why should politicks be introduced into the Church? If prayer meetings is to be held why should they be called "Union Prayer Meetings?" If the Prisperterins, or the Methodies, or the Baptists, or any of the sects choose to hold politereal prayer meetings in their Conventercles, (which they call churches, but which are nothing but meeting-houses) why let 'em, but I don't think church people should countenance such doings; and I for one, know a great many of the members of Trinity that don't approve of it. For my part, I object, and always have, and always shall, to frateruizing with dissenters. Yours Respectful, MARIA WOXCOCKLE.

Post Mortem Expenses.

There has been much said about the illiberality manifested by the Lone Mountain Graveyard Company in their dealings with the public. It appears that the small homestead lot, six feet by four, to which every man is supposed to be entitled to after death, costs $75 in Lone Mountain. This seems to be, just a little, crowding the mourners. All who lose relatives wish to bury them where their remains may not be disturbed, but may remain in quiet until their Mother Earth receives them into her bosom, from whence the original elements of which they are composed were originally borrowed. Graveyard proprietors and undertakers trade upon the best feelings of humanity. It is easy for them to extort money from grief-stricken ones who feel that to bargain about the sum to be paid for the last resting place of those they have lost, would be brutal. It is a pity that the city does not make provisions for establishing a public cemetery, and thus supply graves without charging an exorbitant rent for them.

Taking People Off.

Jump has made some terribly severe caricatures of our leading citizens, and has taken them off in the most severe style, holding them up with all their little peculiarities of countenance and manners, to the ridicule of the public. We last week made fun of the advertisement of Mr. Birch, who is at present giving his entertainment at Lyceum Hall, because he said he was going to give a faithful description of us on his return to England.

We have seen Mr. Birch's entertainment and are convinced from the witnessing the wonderfully natural and unsparing manner in which he caricatures some of his countrymen, that he is a dangerous man. He is almost as good as a live caricaturist, as Jump is with his pencil; and the speed with which the mild-looking Mr. Birch becomes a sailor, a milkman, a fop—or in fact anything else—is certainly surprising.

A Discriminating Critic.

The dramatic critic of the Flag pitches into Madame Celeste for attempting the role of The Woman in Red, and says: "Gamea was the rock on which Vestvali split. Had she assumed some character more adapted to her powers, she would, no doubt, have made a success in San Francisco."

Everyone in San Francisco—except the "dramatic critic" of the Flag—is well aware that "Gamea" was the only part in which Madame Vestvali was really successful; in this impersonation everyone acknowledged she displayed wonderful power, and a thorough conception of the part. The "Beautiful Demon" was the part that d—d decidedly Vestvuli's prospects in this city.

Classical with a Vengeance!

A Boston "literary" journal, the Sunday Times, desiring to grace its columns with a classical quotation, furnishes a new and astounding reading of the first line and a half of Horace's Ode "Ad Postumum," (the fourteenth of the second book.) The Sunday-paper classicist thus improves upon the original:

"Eheul furgacer Posthume, Posthume, Labunier anni. . . ."

This reminds us forcibly of the favorite French phrase—Nourions vourions—of a distinguished Californian, which ever since his return from a visit to Paris (where he acquired an exhaustive knowledge of the latest fashions and of the French language) he has been in the habit of making effective use of in conversation on all topics.

A Model Criticism.

The Alta furnishes the following model criticism of a new novel:

"It is a beautiful story, just the thing to please women. I nearly cried my eyes out over it. The heroine is so unfortunate. She is an English girl who runs away to marry a young widower, whose first wife had been a gipsy girl. But it appears that she is not dead; so the heroine, finding herself not wedded, returns home disgraced in the eyes of society, and ill-treated by her family. It was subsequently discovered that the hero's first wife was dead, and that her twin sister pretended to be the wife for the purpose of extorting money from her brother in law. This discovery made all right, and the hero and heroine are happy at last."

Some "high-toned" review or first-class literary paper should engage that critic. It is a shame that such abilities should waste their sweetness on the desert air of a daily paper. "Why should such gifts be hid? Why have such talents a curtain before them?"

A Popular Sentiment.

There are several pretty little moral sentiments about maternal affection, etc., uttered by the various characters in the play of The Woman in Red; these have, for the most part, failed to draw any applause from the audience; but when Mr. John McCullough, in the character of "Victor," as he lights a cigar, calls it "an unfailing solace in time of trouble, and a soother of care"—a tremendous shout of applause from the audience explains how it is that there are two or three cigar stores in every block in this city.

Rather Tempting.

Two dentists in this city say in their advertisement: "We make a specialty of Filling Teeth with a Mallet." This is really tempting, but we expect that some enterprising business rival will undertake to get ahead of these gentlemen by advertising his "specialty of filling teeth with a sledge hammer." We have always preferred a pile driver ourselves, but a mallet is no doubt pretty good.

Flopping Times.

The Call swore Tuesday's news a stunning "whopper,"
That said the Herald had become a "flopper;"
The wiser Alta thought the news was true,
And so on Wednesday morning it "flopped" too;
But still more wise, the Times, by holding back,
Can take its first start on the winning tack.

Showing Her Teeth.

The Courier, of this city, in a description of Jump's picture of the operatic artists, says that Miss Louise Tourney appears as if she were showing her teeth to the public. Miss Tourney is quite right to show her teeth prettily. However much one may object to a bull-dog's showing his teeth, no one can object to a lady's showing her teeth if Nature—or a talented dentist—has supplied her with a good set.

Very Natural.

The editor of the American Flag says:

"It is said that Artemus Ward, the American clown, is making a fortune in London. He is a regular contributor to Punch. Mr. Punch must be rather hard up for indigenous wit, we infer."

Brainless people who wish to be thought wise, always hate clever men.

Rouge et Noir.

An exchange says: "A negro, with red hair and whiskers, is one of the lions of Mobile."

This must, indeed, be a dandy lion. We have seen many lions with red hair and whiskers—this conjunction of rouge et noir is quite a novelty.

THE next Opposition steamer day will be on the 25th of October. The America is being supplied with new boilers, and will sail on that date.

HOW PHIL CONSIDINE MET THE BANSHEE.

"DID yonr honor ever hear tell," inquired Darby, as we emerged on the direct highway to that portion of her Majesty's dominions called Cahirciveen, "of how Phil Considine met the Banshee?"

"Never!"

I leaped off the car as I answered, glad of the opportunity to stretch my aching limbs. I had penetrated so far into Darby's idiosyncrasy as likewise to know that whenever he volunteered a yarn commencing with, "Did you ever hear tell?" it was an unmistakable signal that the "baste" wanted a rest.

The shades of evening were rapidly descending, the black of night clothed the rugged fastnesses we had left behind us, mists rose in curling wreaths from mountain-moss and lowland lea, the last faint peucilled rays of day were glinting up the far western wave, and the plaintive lowing of the kine mingled with the distant moaning of the ocean; it was just that hour of the evening when the imagination feeds on the marvellous and supernatural. And as Darby threw the reins to his tired steed and strode alongside of me, I could scarcely restrain a wandering glance to each lichen-covered crag or yellow-blossomed furze-brake, momentarily expecting that his wild legends would become realized by the appearance of some one of the strange beings with which he had peopled the romantic West.

"Well, thin, your honor must know," continued Darby, "that the Banshee is a quare sort of spirit, and always appears before a death in a family: it is a woman, yer honor, and generally appears in the gloom of evenin, and keeus to herself just a child singin a wailful, purty, little song; and more times whiu she's angry like, you could hear it risin up in the air, fearsome to hear, fitful and heart-wringin, just like the screech of a dying hare. Arrah! sure, your honor, there isn't one of the raale ould stock at all that hasn't a Banshee in the family, sometimes appearin for misfortin, and more times, whin the corpse candles are lightin; but, bedad, if she spakes to you, ye may lave yer clothes wid the first respectable naybour, and just lie dowu in the most convanient spot, for go yon will, and the less throuble ye give yer relaytions the aisier they'll pray for the repose of yer sowl.

"Phil Considine was a rovin sort uv blade—a regular sporther, and never could settle down to a day's mowin, rapin, or turf-cuttin in his life; but if there was a hare to be soho'd, or a main nv cocks to be fought, or a salmon to be coaxed in sayson or out nv sayson, shnr Phil, the darlin, was the boy to do it; and he had as many pets, betuue dogs, and badgers, an saaless, an game cocks, as id set up a thravelin, showman. He was a hardy crayture, too, an would as lieve sleep out on the side uv a mountain as on the best feather-bed in the barony; ye'd know Phil a mile off by his shamblin gait—half throt, half walk—his ould caubeeu stuck on the back uv his head; an alpeen nv the raale mountain-ash always unaisy in his fist, and the neck nv a black bottle peepin out uv his coat, in which, he said, he carried holy water to defind himself agin the good people; but, bedad, it was so often impty that people began to think at last that he used to meet whole regimints uv them: anyhow, there ye'd see Phil goin along, and divil resave the bush or tuft, that the alpeen wouldu't be shoved into, lookin for hares' forms and the like; and see him settin a trout or a salmon—oh! musha! it was a pitchur intirely. There he'd stand away back from the bank uv the river, shadin his eyes wid his left band, the alpeen in his right, held in the middle, as if it was the but uv a fly-rod: his back donbled up like a rapin hook, and his knees thrimblin backwards and forwards wid every move nv the fish; an often if you watched him close from a hidin place, he'd get so wake in himself that he'd forget, maybe, and take a pull at the holy-wather bottle, all by mistake, uv coorse.

"Well, wid all, Phil was a mighty dacent poor chap, and never a crayture was lyin sick bud Phil id have a nice leverit, or may be a young grouse, or a dawshy silver salmon, an he'd lave it quiet and easy like at the door early uv a mornin, so that nobody id know where it kem from; and sure if he did snare a hare of an odd start, or run a salmon by the light uv a bog dale,—divil a one was the worse of it.

"However, sheep begun to go, an fowl roosts wor found impty uv a mornin, and tho there was a load uv thravellin tinkers about the country, yet the sthrong farmers all about wor down upon poor Phil. Now, Phil was a poor divil that had a conscience, an let the thruth be towld, he had nayther hand, act, nor part in the sheep staylins or fowl sackins that was goin on, for it was an ould thief uv a horse docther, who more betoken got seven years for the same—divil's cure to him!

"Well, Phil was himself again, and wint on wid his ould capers, an people liked him all the better, whin the times all of a suddent fell hard—raale famine the poor craytnres wor sufferin in these parts, and Phil was put to his wits' ends to keep starvatiou from the doore an the life in his poor famishin gorsoons. There was a great big gomersal of a farmer lived down there by the river, over where yer honor sees the big white house beyant!"

"Ay, Darby—I see it!"

"His name was Pat Flaherty, yer honor, an he was cousin german uv that same poor Con. Flaherty that I remimbered yer honor uv a while ago!"

"Anan?"

"He was a cruel, selfish bosthoon; he hadn't an Irish heart about him, at all at all; an tho' he had bread, butther and tay, full an plinty, he'd grudge a crumb the size of a midge's wing.

"One evenin Phil was womasin home sad an weary enough, for the childther hadn't tasted a maal's-mate for two days, an a couple of his naybours wor almost in the dead grips for fair want of food; just as he kem down the boreen by the ind uv Pat Flaherty's house, out jumps an illegant, bewtifully fat hoorisheen uv a pig: Phil's heart lepped into his month, an his teeth began to wather, an bits uv pork wid a selvage nv cabbage begun dancin before his eyes, an every grunt the pig id let as he capered on, stickin his snout first in one sod and thin in another, and thin kicking up his crubeens, an gallopin like mad, med Phil fairly beside himself wid timptation; so Phil repated the Pather, and an office agin the snares uv the evil one; but begor, it was all up with the poor fellow, for the pig kep at him, and squintin quite knowiu like wid his gruntin little gray winky eyes, until, at last, Phil whips off his coateen, an 'hoorishes' to the pig.

"Grunt—grunt—squake—squake! says the pig; and, bedad whilst ye'd sqneeze a goozeberry Phil whips the coat round his head, claps him unther his arm, and away wid him down along the river, and across the bog, runnin like a thorongh-bred at the Curragh, an dodgin like a rat in a haggard.

"Oh faix, it was short work wid poor squeakeen whin onst Phil had him housed; he was kilt, an divided betune the childher an the starvin naybours, an divil as much as a bristle or a bone, a tail or a tusk ever told who tasted the pig.

"Och! ye may be shure, your honor, there was Miliamurther at Pat's whin the pig was missed; the whole barony was sarched, for Flaherty was cruel vindictive in his way; but sight nor light uv the grunther never was fonnd.

"Phil, as I said before, yer honor, had a conscience, an id was very sevare on him; divil a sod he could pass that he didn't think he saw the pig's snout sticking out uv id, an every uoan on the breeze seemed like a dyin grunt; for ye see it was the first civilized animal he ever come by in an unther hand sort uv a way: oh! no, yer honor—Phil was very high in that respect; I wont say the same uv the wild bastes uv the field; for, shure, as he used to say, 'God Almighty gave them for everybody's use;' an as to a pack uv grouse, or a whisp uv snipe, or snarin a scutty tail, begor, he'd sweep 'em the same as a live coal would a turf clamp.

"Phil daren't go to Father Doolin; for Pat Flaherty was great in the dues, and the fat goose, or the tindher turkey, much less a goolden crock of butther, or a creel of the raale red-bog turf, was never wautin whin the coadjuthor gev the wink; so he was afeared to say boo to a bulrush, for he knew that 'Paudeen More' had his suspecs uv him, and that the fate uv the horse-docther was nothin to the transportatiou that my poor Phil id get, if he was found out.

"One evenin just like this, yer honor, Phil was comin down by the ould castle uv Rosscarberry, a great ould sthronghould, too, an a bad spot to be near at nightfall; for the ould chieftains, they say, walks about there still, and many is the quare sight and sound I heerd tell uv the same spot. Well, yer honor, as I was sayin, Phil was comin along purty brisk, whin just as he got near the stile by the onld tower, the sight left his eyes a'most; for there, sittin unther the withered branch of the eldther three, was—divil resave the doubt—the Banshee herself, ay, thrue enough; dnsky white, and croonin away, as she rocked backwards and forwards, with her arms restin on her knees.

"Phil's heart was goin thump—thump—thug—thug that you might hear it a mile off, his jaw hung loose an thrimblin like the dewlap of a cow, every bone in his body shook and rattled like a bladder full uv pays, an his knees wer playiu hide and go seek wid one another.

"'Phil Considine?' says the Banshee.

"'Poo-ho-ooh!' blurted out Phil, fallin down on his marrow-bones.

"'Phil Considine?' says the Banshee.

"'Holy Mary uv Aigypt!' began Phil.

"'Howld yer tongue!' says the sperit, 'an attind to me!'

"'Y—y—yis, Mam!' says Phil, takin a pull at the holy-wather bottle.

"'Phil Considine!' says the Banshee. 'I've been watchin yer goins on!'

"'Seven Pathers and eight Aves for the repose uv yer poor sainted sowl!' whimpers Phil.

"'Phil!' says the sperit. 'Ive been watchin ye, an there's somethin heavy on yer conscience!'

"'All the way to the Cross nv Coppla, wid pays in my brogans!' groans Phil.

"'Confess at onst!' says the Banshee, wid a screech that made the ould tower rock agin, whilst the leaves on the eldthers shook and rattled like tundther, an a big white owl flew out, wid a whoop that made the hair of Phil's head stand nv an ind.

"'Whoo o-o-o!' cries Phil. 'I stole a pig!' says he.

"'Ye stole a pig, ye murtherin vagabond!' says she.

"'I did, ma'am, av ye plaze, an be marciful—marciful—an give us a long day to repint uv the same!'

"'Oh—hoo—hoo!' says she, wid a wailful croon, 'an who did ye stale the pig from, ye misfortunate craythur?'

"'Pat Flaherty!' moans Phil.

"'What—ye stale a pig from Pat Flaherty? the good—pious Pat Flaherty, that attinds to his devotions, and takes care uv his clargy; go directly and restore the dacint man his pig!'

"'Begor, I can't says Phil, gettin bould wid another swig of the holy-wather. 'Begor, I can't, mam,' says he, 'for we ate the pig!'

"'Oh, ye haythen sinner!' says the sperit, "ye onlooky thievein naygnr! See here, now Phil Considine!' says she, and she lifts up her hood, an her eyes glowered out at him like two stars in the middle of a winuowin sheet. 'Mark my words!" says she.

"'Yis, ma'am!' says Phil.

"'The day uv judgment 'ill come!' says she.

"'Thrue for you, alanna!' answers Phil.

"'I'll be there!' says she.

"'More glory to you, ma'am!' says Phil, taking another throw uv the black bottle.

"'An you'll be there!' says she.

"'Id's myself 'ill be prond to meet yon, anyhow—hic—hic hiccup!' says Phil.

"'An Pat Flaherty 'ill be there!' says she.

"'Ugh, the dirty b—b—baste!' says Phil.

"'An the pig 'ill be there!' says she.

"'Whoo—be jabers! Banshee, jewel, I have id!' yells Phil, flinging the alpeen and the bottle. 'I'll say, there, Pat Flaherty—there's yer pig!'"

DAHOMEY AMAZONS HUNTING THE ELEPHANT

MOST of our readers are aware that the bravest part of the Dahomey army is a legon of highly trained women, who are considered the elite of that body.

At a future time we shall treat of their exploits in war. During time of peace, their favorite amusement is hunting the elephant, a pastime at which they are very skillful, dangerous as it is.

When they come within range of a troop of the animals, they surround them and creep up under the cover of the trees and bushes, and when within good aiming distance, they fire simultaneously at the command of their leader.

Always several elephants remain helpless or killed upon the spot; but woe to the unlucky huntresses wh find themselves in the track of these that flee, particularly if they have been wounded.

The gigantic creatures become terribly ferocious with pain and rage, and several times the most horrible accidents have occurred to the intrepid women.

A short time before I reached Dahomey, two of the king's favorite Amazons had lost their lives in these perilous haunts. They were stationed near together, and both engaged in loading and firing again at the retreating flock, so much engrossed, that neither saw nor heard two wounded elephants who were rushing toward them through the long weeds. Some of their companions beheld their danger and cried out, but it was too late.

The hapless women turned; before they could flee, one of them was imprisoned between the enormous tusks of the foremost elephant, pinned to the ground, and her life trampled out under the blows from his trunk and feet—one last cry of agony from her tortured lips ringing dismally through the ears of her sisters.

Before any of the band could take aim and fire, the other elephant had seized her companion in his trunk, elevated her high in air, while with a last instinct of courage and self-preservation, her hand tried to clutch her carbine as it fell from her grasp.

For an instant the infuriated animal held her poised thus aloft, then with a single twist of his trunk, sent her flying through the air, and her mangled corpse fell so close to her agonized companions, who watched the terrible spectacle, that her blood spattered their faces as she fell. The victims were deeply regretted by the band, and their grief was shared by the monarch and his whole kingdom. They had been celebrated for their daring in battle, their wonderful strength and address at games of skill, and more than all, their inhuman cruelty to any prisoner who fell into their hands during battle.

The troops, among their other war-songs, preserve a chant celebrating the prowess of this unlucky pair lamenting their untimely end, and hurling their names at their foes as a shout of triumph which must carry dismay to their hearts.

A LITTLE girl, after having been to church, was very fond of preaching to her doll. Her mother overheard her, one day, reproving one for being so wicked. "O, you naughty, sinful child," she said, shaking its waxen limbs; "you'll just go to that place of brimstone and molasses, and you won't burn up—you'll just sizzle."

AGUA DE MAGNOLIA.—The prettiest thing, the "sweetest thing," and the most of it for the least money. It overcomes the odor of perspiration; softens and adds delicacy to the skin; is a delightful perfume; allays headache and inflammation, and is a necessary compaiion in the sick room, in the nursery and upon the toilet sideboard. It can be obtained everywhere at one dollar per bottle.

NO FORFEITING.—Heretofore, if a person holding a Life Policy became unfortunate, and could not raise the sum of money required to pay his next premium, his policy was declared forfeited. The BROOKLYN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK has decided to make EVERY POLICY it issues NON-FORFEITABLE, giving a PAID-UP POLICY to the party if unable to continue his payments of premiums. The dividends of the Brooklyn Life Insurance Company are settled annually in cash. This plan is far more acceptable to insurers than at the end of three or five years, as in other companies. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company allows thirty days grace in the payment of premiums. Its policies are incontestable, and its losses are promptly paid. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company offers every known plan of Life and Endowment Insurance. Get a pamphlet at the office, 240 Montgomery street, southeast corner of Pine, from Stephen T. King, General Manager, or David B. Arrowsmith, Local Agent.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

"THE SCIENCE OF LIFE, OR HOW TO LIVE, AND WHAT TO LIVE FOR."—This is the title of an interesting and highly useful little book, published by Dr. Beck, of this city. It is especially adapted for the perusal of young men, nevertheless its truthful pages should be read by all, as they contain good, sound, healthy matter which can be easily understood and appreciated by every reader. This work is issued gratuitously on application to the Doctor, or will be sent free to any address on receipt of postage stamp or envelope addressed to Dr. Beck's office, 314 Kearny street, or post office Box 1599.

Dr. Beck is a member of several American and European Universities, and has published numerous works on Anatomy, Medicine, and Surgery His former connection with the principal "Anatomical Museums" of New York, Paris, London, etc., combined with his experience in his profession render him a highly desirable person to consult, and we can confidently recommend him to the public.

EMPEROR MAX has received important news from his vrow, Carlotta; though his having no children, accounts for his not having heard that at C. A. FLETCHER'S, No. 1 Montgomery street, can be found the largest and most elegant assortment of BOY'S CLOTHING there is in the city. Boys' Suits as usual made to order from a superior line of Cloths and Cassimeres, always on hand, after the regular Eastern Fashion Plates, received monthly; this being the only Boys' Clothing House in receipt of them. LADIES, ATTENTION!—Direct Importation from Paris.—Please recollect that there is only one Shawl House in California, J. D. Robert. 119 and 121 Montgomery street, which receives direct, Genuine Square and Long Broche Cashmere Shawls of every description and price, from Robert, Gosselin & Son, manufacturers in Paris. Don't make a mistake.

N. B.—Cloaks, Basques, Zouaves and Dresses of every description made to order in the latest style. Prices as cheap as possible.

ALL GOOD JUDGES OF PIANOS agree that Frisbee & Scott have the finest and largest stock of Pianos in this city. They are agents of the celebrated firms of Calenberg & Vaupel, of New York, and Knabe & Co., Baltimore. There is certainly not an instrument equal to those imported by them. Mr. Gusvav A. Scott pays, also, particular attention to having their stock of foreign and American sheet music equal to any New York store. They keep at No. 3 Montgomery street, Masonic Temple.

A SUMMER AND WINTER MEDICINE.

"Great oaks from little acorns grow."

The worst diseases known to the human race spring from causes so small as to almost defy detection. The volumes of scientific lore that fill the tables and shelves of the medical fraternity only go to prove and elaborate these facts.

Then guard yourselves while you may. The smallest pimple on the skin is a tell-tale and indicator of disease. It may fade and die away from the surface of the body, but it will reach the vitals, perhaps, at last, and death be the result and final close. Maggiel's Bilious, Dyspeptic and Diarrhœa Pills cure where all others fail. While for Burns, Scalds, Chilblains, Cuts, and all abrasions of the skin, Maggiel's Salve is infallible. Sold by J. Maggiel, 43 Fulton street, New York, and all Druggists, at 25 cents per box.

REMARKS ON EATING.

PROF. BLOT says it is a fact beyond a question that the intellectnal and moral faculties of man are influeuced in a large degree in their operations by those physical conditions which are dependent upon our food. Physiology proves that it is the contraction of the muscles that prodnces wrinkles ; therefore, a person whose food is properly prepared will always appear younger and more beautiful than one who follows no scientific principles in his eating. Good food, properly prepared, will keep his muscles in order and elastic. Any one, male or female, young or old, starting with a good stomach, can keep healthy and in good flesh with proper food ; it is only necessary to select the kind required by the constitution, and prepare it judiciously. It is not what we eat that makes ns fat, but what we digest. Bad food may bring a temporary bloatedness, but not the plumpness of good health. He agreed with the opinion expressed by Thomas Jefferson, as well as by a celebrated New York clergyman, that good things have been made by the Creator for good people. Another thing in food, it ought always to be prepared according to the age of the person for whom it is intended, and for the sex, as well as according to the climate and the season. In winter more fatty matter is necessary to be eaten than at any other time of the year. In spring, greens, which purify the blood and remove the bile occasioned by eating fatty snbstances in the winter. In winter we need more bile ; in the spring we must get rid of it if we would be healthy. When warm or hot weather comes we must supply the wasted system by eating meat. Meat is better in summer than anything else. It is a great mistake to suppose that vegetables are the best for the stomach at this season of the year. He recommends roast beef for summer. Skim off the fat. Don't bring fat to the table.

AMONG the recent inventions in France, which have been brought to light by the discussion of the needle gun, is one which fires twenty balls a minute, and has a musical box in the butt, thus doing away with the necessity of regimental bands.

As a practical joke, a petition numerously signed was addressed to a boarder at one of the hotels in Saratoga—a hard water-drinker—requesting him to leave the place, as he was exhausting the spring. His capacity is prodigious.

HIGH.—A Bismuth mine has been opened in South America, two-thirds up the highest peak of the Andes—the Iljamper mountain. It is fifteen thousand and six feet above the sea, and just below the line or perpetual snow.

STATISTICAL.—Of six hundred and twelve young ladies who fainted last year, more than one half of them fell in the arms of gentleman. Only three had the misfortune to fall on the floor.

"Do you consider lager beer intoxicating?" "Vell, ash for dat, I gant zay. I trink feefty to seexty classes a tay, end it tosh not hurt me, but I don't know how it would pe if a man vash to make a hog of hisself."

SISTER GRACE.

SISTER GRACE in wimple white,
Hood of gray, and robe all sable,
Comes from where the convent casts
Shadows from each tower and gable.

Sister Grace the abbess sends,
With her hazel rod and basket,
Fish to catch for convent supper.
Her meek nature, how they task it!

Swallows fly in crescents swift
O'er the ripples and the shallows,
Where, bowed down with tearless grief,
Bend the melancholy sallows.

Clear and loud she chants the psalm,
Clear it sounds across the cover;
Laughing echoes words return,
Answers from some phantom lover.

Dragon-flies, in Emerald mail,
Glance around her float, that's bobbing;
On the yellow bough above
Chirps his little hymn the robin.

Flashing springs of silver trout;
Stately black-browed swans come steering,
Where the willow-flowers bloom pink,
Where the swirling current's veering.

Sister Grace is all intent
On the scarlet float that's swimming,
Where among the osier stems,
Brown and full, the tide is brimming.

The Magnificent she sings,
While her hazel-rod is bending;
Benedicite she chants
For the day so softly ending.

Clear and loud, the holy psalm
Sounds across the sloping cover;
Laughing echoes words return,
Greetings from some phantom lover.

Still the echo answers her
From among the leafy beeches—
Laughing answers, sweet replies,
Sounding like a lover's speeches.

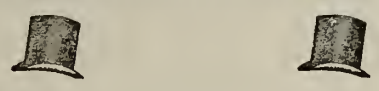
Where the green flags, sharp and keen,
Cast their zigzag shadows,
Sister Grace sits there, and hears
The thrushes singing in the meadows.

Lazy ripples move around
The yellow water-flowers so stately;
Still sits Sister Grace alone—
Calm, contented, and sedately.

Swallows' shadows come and go;
All the eastern hill is sunny;
To and fro the lingering bees
Cruise half-wearily for honey.

Clear and loud fair Sister Grace
Sings, and far across the cover,
From the hillside comes the echo,
Answers from a phantom lover.

Come the white moths to the flowers,
Purple water-buds are quivering;
Pulsing breezes o'er the grass
Creep with slow and gentle shivering.



Sister Grace waits till the rod
Bends with strange and mighty fishes:
Orange, golden, barred and striped—
Ornament for convent dishes.

Wind comes shaking lily stems,
Tossing, surging through the beeches—
Wind that bears the echoes soft,
As of a phantom lover's speeches.

Suddenly between the reeds
Laughs a face, and greets the Sister;
Then a hand stole round her waist,
And a living lover kissed her.

Benedicites they sang—
Ayes many—night and morning;
But the watcher never saw
Truant Sister Grace returning.

WOMAN.—"I have always observed," says the celebrated traveler, Ledyard, "the women in all countries are civil, obliging tender and humane. To a woman, whether civilized or savage, I never addressed myself in the language of decency and friendship, without receiving a decent and friendly answer. With men it has often been otherwise. I wandered over the barren plains of inhospitable Denmark; through honest Sweden, and frozen Lapland; rude and churlish Finland; unprincipled Russia; and the wide spread regions of the wandering Tartar, if hungry, dry, cold, wet, or sick, the women have ever been friendly to me, and uniformly so; and to add to this virtue (so worthy the appellation of benevolence,) these actions have been performed in so free and kind a manner, that if I was dry, I drank the sweetest draught, and if hungry, I ate the coarsest meal with a double relish.

CURRAN'S OPINION OF SELF-PRAISE.

CURRAN and Erskine had frequent opportunities of meeting, and must have looked on each other's powers with respect. On one occasion Grattan's name was mentioned; and Erskiue casually asked what "he said of himself." "Said of himself!" was Curran's astonished interjection; "nothing. Grattan speak of himself! Why, sir, Henry Grattan is a great man. Sir, the torture could not wring a syllable of self-praise from Grattan; a team of six horses could uot drag au opinion of himself out of him. Like all great men, he knows the strength of his reputation, and will never condescend to proclaim its march, like the trumpeter of a puppet-show. Sir, he stands on a national altar, and it is the business of us inferior men to keep up the fire of the incense. You will never see Grattan stooping to do either one or the other."

This sally may have been stimnlated in some degree by one of those fits of irritability to which Curran was liable; but no man could be more entitled to the praise than the speaker himself. Of course, every man of vigorous, faculties kuows his own powers, and knows them better than the world can. But no popular applause—and he was its idol—no homage of his profession—and he was the acknowledged meteor of the Irish bar—and no admiration of private society—and he was the delight of the table—could ever betray Curran into self-praise.

It must be supposed, that when he was thus scrupulous in his own instance, he demanded no less reserve from others. When Lord Byron rose into fame, Curran constantly objected to his talking of himself, as the great drawback to his poetry.

"Any subject," said he, "but the eternal one of self. I am weary of knowing once a month the state of any man's hopes or fears, rights or wrongs. I should as soon read a register of the weather, the barometer up to so many inches to-day, and down to so many inches to-morrow. I feel scepticism all over me at the sight of agonies on paper, things that come as regular and as notorious as the full of the moon. The truth is, his lordship weeps for the press, and wipes his eyes with the public."

DISCOVERIES OF THE LAST FIFTY YEARS.—This is an age, among other things, of discovery. The human intellect has employed itself upon scientific investigation, within the last fifty years with wonderful energy and success. Among the discoveries of the last century are:

The steamboat.—Fulton launched the first one in 1807. Now there are over three thonsand steamboats traversing the waters of America. Nearly all the rivers in the world are traversed by steamboats.

Magnetic Telegraph.—In 1800 it took weeks to convey intelligence between Philadelphia and New Orleans, now it can be done iu as many minutes by the electric telegraph, which only had its beginuing in 1843.

Voltaism was discovered in March, 1800.

The electro-magnet was discovered iu 1821.

Electrotyping was discovered ouly a few years ago.

Hoe's printing press, capable of printing 20,000 copies an hour, is a very recent discovery, but of most important character.

Gaslight was unknown in 1800, now every city and town of pretense is lighted with it.

M. Daguerre communicated to the world his beautiful invention in 1839.

Chloroform is also of recent discovery.

Astronomy has added a large number of new planets to the solar system.

BE JUST, as sincere equity snpports the human race. Be good, as bounty attaches every heart. Be indulgent, since thou livest among beings weak like thyself. Be modest, as pride hnrts the self-love of every human being. Pardon injuries, as vengeance engenders hatred. Do good to him who injures thee, that thou mayest show thyself greater than he, and also gain friendship. Be moderate, temperate and chaste, since voluptuousness, intemperance and excess destroy thy being, and render thee contemptible.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

DR. MAGGIEL'S

Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these

LIFE-GIVING PILLS!

Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, but to cure. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be

A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,

For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, that Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever

AN ETERNAL SPRING!

It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.

THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES

Cannot stay the flight of years, but they can force back, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, but seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—

FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS

Nothing can be more productive of cure than these Pills. Their utmost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest

VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.

FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS

And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, but penetrates with the most searching effects to the very root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills

Invariably cure the following diseases:

Asthma,
Bowel Complaints,
Coughs,
Colds,
Chest Diseases,
Costiveness,
Dyspepsia,
Diarrhœa,
Dropsy,
Debility,
Female Complaints,
Fever and Ague
Headache,
Indigestion,

COMETH A BLESSING DOWN.

NOT to the man of dollars,
Not to the man of deeds,
Not to the man of cunning,
Not to the man of creeds;
Not to the one whose passion
Is for the world's renown,
Not in the form of fashion,
Cometh a blessing down.

Not unto the land's expansion,
Not to the miser's chest,
Not to the princely mansion,
Not to the brazoned crest,
Not to the sordid worldling,
Not to the knavish clown,
Not to the haughty tyrant,
Cometh a blessing down.

Not to the folly blinded,
Not to the steeped in shame,
Not to the carnal minded,
Not to unholy fame;
Not in neglect of duty,
Not in the monarch's crown,
Not at the smile of beauty,
Cometh a blessing down.

But to the one whose spirit
Yearns for the great and good;
Unto the one whose store-house
Yieldeth the hungry food;
Unto the one who labors,
Fearless of foe or frown,
Unto the kindly hearted,
Cometh blessing down.

RANDOLPH.

RANDOLPH, in dress and appearance, at the age of thirty-five years, appeared like a lad of eighteen. It was not so much what was said, but the speaker's manner and appearance, that gave such a withering force, generally, if not always, in debate, pointing his skinny finger with ludicrous or feeling effect.

It was during the session of the Virginia convention, of which he was a member, that a large crowd had assembled, among it many ladies, patiently waiting to hear him on the subject in which he was known to be interested. It was near five o'clock in the afternoon before his long, lank form was seen quickly to pop up from his seat. The hum of voices was instantly hushed, all listening for the first words of his speech. Looking around for some time, he said--

"I do not feel, Mr. President, that this convention is a suitable place for ladies, and I must plainly tell them that I shall quickly speak that which will make them move."

It was enough; the galleries were cleared of the ladies in double quick when he proceeded.

A gentleman (my old and lamented schoolmaster) once told me that he had been standing some five hours in the hall, waiting to hear Randolph, and had become almost tired out; but when he commenced, his fatigue seemed suddenly to leave him, and so rich was the repast, such "a feast of reason, and a flow of soul," that he would willingly have remained five hours more after its conclusion.

His sarcastic reply to John Hampden Pleasants, the editor of the Richmond Whig, is very generally known, but the circumstances attending it may not be uninteresting. During a speech in Congress, he had been so bitter and violent in his attack upon the editor of the Richmond Whig as to induce Mr. Pleasants to proceed to Washington to give him a cowhiding. Mr. P. had barely gotten on Pennsylvania Avenue, when he beheld Randolph approaching, and, wishing to provoke him, he placed himself directly in his path, and insultingly remarked, "I never give way for a scoundrel;" when quick as thought, and with great nonchalance of manner, Randolph passed round him, replying, "I always do, sir."

So good was the retort that it disarmed Mr. Pleasants—who ever enjoyed a good joke—who stood laughing while Randolph quietly pursued his way, as if nothing had ever happened. Pleasants told this jnke as the best he ever enjoyed.

ONLY the other day a young lady asked me: "What is your favorite flower?" I answered, of course, "extra family;" when for some reason or other, all the females in the room set up the endless giggle they are so famous for.

AYER'S

Cathartic Pills,

ARE THE MOST PERFECT purgative which we are able to produce, or which we think has ever yet been made by anybody. Their effects have abundantly shown to the community how much they excel the ordinary medicines in use. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. Their penetrating properties stimulate the vital activities of the body, remove the obstructions of its organs, purify the blood, and expel disease. They purge out the foul humors which breed and grow distemper, stimulate sluggish or disordered organs into their natural action, and impart a healthy tone with strength to the whole system. Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases. While they produce powerful effects, they are at the same time, in diminished doses, the safest and best physic that can be employed for children. Being sugar-coated, they are pleasant to take; and, being purely vegetable, are free from any risk of harm. Cures have been made which surpass belief, were they not substantiated by men of such exalted position and character, as to forbid the suspicion of untruth. Many eminent clergymen and physicians have lent their names to certify to the public the reliability of our remedies, while others have sent us the assurance of their conviction that our Preparations contribute immensely to the relief of our afflicted, suffering fellow men.

The Agent below named is pleased to furnish gratis our American Almanac, containing directions for the use and certificates of their cures, of the following complaints.

Costiveness, Bilious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache arising from foul stomach, Nausea, Indigestion, Morbid Inaction of the Bowels and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Diseases which require an evacuant medicine. They also, by purifying the blood and stimulating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach, such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability, Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout, and other kindred complaints arising from a low state of the body, or obstruction of its functions.

Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand AYER'S and take no others. The sick want the best aid there is for them, and they should have it.

San Francisco, September 15th, 1866. 4t

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

MARY SMITH, Plaintiff, vs. WILLIAM SMITH, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to WILLIAM SMITH, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and that one half of the Defendant's property, if he have any, be awarded to Plaintiff, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 27th day of June in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure. but

NEWELL'S

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded or the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea-sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

ANOTHER ASCENT OF MOUNT HOOD.

WE copy from the Vancouver Register the following account of the ascent of Mount Hood, made by H. K. Hines and Company, in August last. We omit the primary ascent of the main range of mountains, and the night's encampment at the foot of Mount Hood, and take the record where the party, after passing over decayed volcanic rock intermixed with ashes, meet the snow line:

"We tied our horses at the foot of a broad field of snow which sweeps around the south side of the mountain for several miles in length extending upward to the immediate summit of the mountain perhaps three miles. The ascent of this snow field is comparatively easy. It is smooth and only in places so steep as to render the footsteps uncertain. Near the upper edge of this snow field the deep gorge from which flows an affluent of the Des Chutes, on the right, and of the Sandy on the left approach each other, and seem to cut down into the very foundations of the mountain. The waters were rushing from beneath the glaciers, which at the upper extremity were rent and broken into fissures and corners of unknown depth. From some of these was issuing a blue sulphurous smoke exceedingly nauseating.

"A few hundred feet above this we reached a point of rocks projecting through the snow, from which steam and smoke were issuing, and which were in places so hot that we could not hold fragments of them in our hands. Here we lingered for a time, and then turned our faces towards a yawning chasm which cut across the fields of ice some five or six hundred feet altitude from the summit of the mountain and perhaps two hundred above where we stood. Following the course of this chasm to the left, we found a place where with a little care it could be crossed, by the help of our staves, and then turned our faces directly up the last steep ascent towards the extreme summit. This ascent was at an angle of not less than sixty-five degrees, but the snow was softened by the hot sun so that it was not difficult to obtain a foothold, though the climbing was exceedingly toilsome. It took us near three-fourths of an hour to make this ascent. But as we neared the summit, a grand and thrilling excitement seemed to thrill and kindle through every nerve, and we sprang upon the pinnacle with the agility of gazelles. At one o'clock P. M., we reached it, having been just six hours in making the ascent from our camp. Now let us look around.

"The summit of the mountain is a circular ridge of three or four hundred yards in length, having its outward curve to the north. On this ridge there are three or four eminences rising a few feet above the average of the ridge. The highest of these is the one to the east, though it is only a few feet higher than the others. We passed along the entire ridge and over these elevations. The snow upon them is from six to ten feet in depth, and only in one place did a single rock project through it. That was the extreme summit of the highest point of the ridge, and the highest point of land in the United States. On this rock, covering them with a large fragment broken from it, we left mementoes of our visit.

"The scene around was overpoweringly indescribable. I could select here and there a point and speak of it, but to present the scene is a simple and utter impossibility. It would require the canvas and brush and years of toil to give an idea to the eye. Yet a few general observations may be taken. The first is the Cascade range itself. From south to north its whole line is at once under the eye, from Diamond Peak to Ranier, a distance of not less than four hundred miles. Within that distance are Mounts St. Helens, Baker, Jefferson and the Three Sisters, making, with Mount Hood, eight snow-covered mountains. Eastward the Blue Mountains are in distinct view for at least five hundred miles in length, and lying between them and us are the broad plains of the Des Chutes, John Day's and Umatilla rivers, one hundred and fifty miles in width. On the west the piny crests of the Coast Range cut clear against the sky, with the Willamette Valley sleeping in quiet beauty at their feet. The broad belt of the Columbia winds gracefully through the evergreen valley toward the ocean. Within these wide limits is every variety of mountain and valley, lake and prairie, bold, beetling precipices and gracefully rounded summits, blending and melting away into each other, forming a whole of unutterable magnificence.

"On our way down we went into the crater of the mountain. It opens through an immense ice cave down which we descended until our way was stopped by a perpendicular wall of fifty or sixty feet in height. If we had a rope I should certainly have ventured to the bottom, but as it was, was obliged to content myself with looking into the steaming, smoking mouth of the crater. In two hours from the summit we reached our camp, judging the distance to be six miles. At night we began to pay the price of our day's work. The glare of the sun on the snow had burned our faces and blinded our eyes so that sleep was out of the question. A very long night was succeeded by morning at last, but two of our party were totally unable to open their eyes. All that day we lay in camp, they blind as rocks, and suffering the most excruciating pain. At 4 P. M. we took horse, the blind men tying up their red and swollen eyes with wet handkerchiefs, and Mr. Moreland and myself leading their horses, travelled until nine o'clock. The next morning one was able to see enough to guide his own horse, but the other could not open his eyes until we reached Revenue's at eleven o'clock A. M. But the prize was worth the pain, though the pain might all have been avoided by simply wearing a veil.

CHARLES LAMB.—Lamb himself was always dressed in black. "I take it," he says, "to be the proper costume of an author." When this was once objected to, at a wedding, he pleaded the raven's apology in the fable, that "he had no other." His clothes were entirely black, and he wore long black gaiters, up to the knees. His head was bent a little forward, like one who had been reading; and, if not standing or walking, he generally had in his hand an old book, a pinch of snuff, or, later in the evening, a pipe. He stammered a little, pleasantly, just enough to prevent his making speeches; just enough to make you listen eagerly for his words, always full of meaning, or charged with a jest; or referring (but this was rare) to some line or passage from one of the old Elizabethan writers, which was always ushered in with a smile of tender reverence. When he read aloud it was with a slight tone, which I used to think he had caught from Coleridge; Coleridge's recitation, however, rising to a chant. Lamb's reading was not generally in books of verse, but in the old lay writers, whose tendency was towards religious thoughts. He liked, however, religious verse: "I can read," he writes to Bernard Barton, "the homely old version of the Psalms in our prayer-books, for an hour or two, without sence of weariness." He avoided manuscripts as much as practicable: "all things read raw to me in manuscript." Lamb wrote much, including many letters; but his hands were wanting in pliancy, ("inveterate clumsiness" are his words,) and his handwriting was, therefore, never good. It was neither text nor runing hand, and the letters did not indicate any fluency; it was not the writing of an old man nor of a young man; yet it had a very peculiar character; stiff, resolute, distinct; quite unlike all others that I have seen, and easily distinguishable amongst a thousand.—*Charles Lamb. BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES,

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

CHAPTER I.

IN THE AVENUE.

"I'M to keep to the right?"

"Keep on a bearin' to the right, sir, 'cross Watch Common, and down One Ash Hill, and that'll bring you straight on to Poynings, sir! No luggage, sir?"

"None, thank you!"

"Luggage! no! I should think not! party's without a overcoat, don't you see, Thomas?—without a overcoat, and it freezin' like mad! Poynings, indeed! What's he doin' there? He don't look much like one of the company! More like after the spoons, I should say!"

The polite porter who had made the inquiry, and the satirical station-master who had commented on the reply, remained gazing for a minute or two at the stranger who had just arrived at the Amherst station of the Southeastern Railway, and then went back to their occupations.

"Freezing like mad." The station-master was right. The frost had set in with the commencement of February, hard, black, and evidently lasting. The iron-bound roads rang again, even under the thin boots of the stranger, who hurried over them with a light and fleeting step. The sharp, keen air whirling over bleak Watch Common so penetrated his thin and wretched clothing, that he shivered horribly, and, stopping for an instant, beat his sides with his hands in an awkward manner, as one to whom the process was new, and who was vainly endeavoring to imitate some action he had seen.

Then he hurried on with a short, rapid, jerking step, essentially different from the league-swallowing, swinging pace of the regular pedestrian accustomed to exercise; stumbling over the frozen, solid, ruts made by the heavy cart-wheels, slipping on the icy puddles, and ever and anon pausing to take fresh breath, or to place his hand against his loudly-beating heart. As he skirted the farther edge of the common, and arrived at the brow of the hill which the porter had mentioned to him, and which he recognized by the solitary tree whose branches clanged above him in the night-wind, he heard, by the chimes of a distant church, ten o'clock rung out sharp and clear through the frosty air. He stopped, counted each chime, and then set off again at a quickened pace, his progress down the descent being easier now, muttering to himself as he went,

"Ten o'clock! I must press on, or they'll all be in bed, I suppose. Beastly respectable, old Carruthers, from what I can make out from the Madre, and what little I saw of him! Servants up to prayers and all that kind of thing. No chance of getting hold of her, if I can't make her know I am there, before those prayers come off. Glass of cold water and flat candlestick directly they're over, I suppose, and a kiss to Missy and God bless you all round, and off to bed! By George, what a life! What an infernal, moping, ghostly, dreary existence! And yet they've got money, these scoundrels, and old Carruthers could give you a check that would make you wink. Could! Yes, but wouldn't, 'specially to me! Ba, ba, black sheep, and all the rest of it! Here's a poor tainted mutton for you, without the wind being in the least tempered to him! Jove, it goes through me like a knife! There'll be a public-house somewhere near, I suppose, and when I've drawn the Madre, I'll step off there and have some hot rum and water before turning in. Hold up, there, you hawbuck brute, pull your other rein! What's the use of your lamps, if they don't show you people in the road?"

He had sprung aside as he spoke, and now stood flat against and pushing into the leafless hedge as a carriage with flashing lamps and steaming horses whirled so closely by him as almost to brush his arm. The coachman paid no attention to his outcry, nor did the footman, who, almost hidden in overcoats, was fast asleep in the rumble behind.

The next instant the carriage was whirling away; but the pedestrian, seeing the condition of the footman, had swung himself on to the hind step, and, crouching down behind the rumble and its unconscious occupant, obtained a shelter from the bitter wind, and simultaneously a lift on his road. There he crouched, clinging firmly with both hands in close proximity to the enshrouded knees of the unconscious footman—knees which, during their owner's sleep, were very helpless and rather comic, which smote each other in the passage of every rut, and occasionally parted and surveyed the dreary gulf of horse-cloth between them, to be brought together at the next jolt with a very smart concussion; and there he remained until the stopping of the carriage, and a sharp cry of "Gate" from the coachman, induced him to descend from his perch, and to survey the state of affairs from that side of the carriage most removed from a certain light and bustle into which they had entered. For, on the other side of the carriage to that on which the stranger stood, was an old-fashioned stone lodge with twinkling lights in its little mullioned windows, and all its thousand ivy-leaves gleaming in the carriage-lamps, and happy faces grouped around its door. There was the buxom lodge-keeper the centre of the group, with her comely red face all aglow with smiles; and there was her light-haired, sheep-faced husband standing by the swinging iron gates; and there were the sturdy children, indulged with the unwonted dissipation of "sitting up;" and there was the gardener's wife awaiting to see company come in, while her master had gone up to look at fires in hothouses; and there were Kidd, the head-keeper, and little Tom, his poor idiot boy, who clapped his hands at the whirling lights of the carriages, and kept up an incessant boom of imbecile happiness. Sheep-faced male lodge-keeper bobbing so furiously as to insist on recognition, down goes window of carriage farthest from the stranger, and crisp on the night-air cries a sharp, curt voice—

"How do, Bulger? Not late, eh? hum—ah! not late?"

To which Bulger, pulling at invisible lock of hair on forehead—

"No, Sir John! Lots company, Sir John! Seasonable weather, Sir—"

But the carriage was whirled away before Bulger could conclude, and before the stranger could resume his place under the sheltering lea of the now conscious footman. He shrank back into the darkness—darkness deeper and thicker than ever under the shadow of the tall elms forming the avenue leading to the house, and remained for a minute buried in thought.

The night was clear, and even light, with the hard, chilly light of stars, and the air was full of cold,—sharp, pitiless, and piercing. The wind made itself heard but rarely, but spared the wayfarer not one pang of its presence. He shrank and shivered, as he peered from under the gaunt branches of the trees after the carriage with its glittering lights.

"Just like my luck!" he thought, bitterly. "Nothing is to be wanting to make me feel myself the outcast that I am. A stranger in my mother's house, disowned and proscribed by my mother's husband, slinking like a thief behind the carriages of my mother's fine friends. I will see my mother, I must see her; it is a desperate chance, but surely it must succeed. I've no doubt of her, God bless her! but I have my doubts of her power to do what I want."

He emerged from the shadow of the trees again, and struck into the avenue. He quickened his pace, shivering, and seeing the long line of way lying level before him, in the sombre glimmer of the night, he went on with a more assured step. Angry and better thoughts were keeping the young man company, a gloomy wrath was in his dark, deep-set eyes, and the hands which he thrust into his coat-pockets clenched themselves with an almost fierce impatience. He strode on, muttering, and trying to keep up an air of hardihood) though there was no one to be deceived but himself), which was belied by the misgivings and remorse at his heart.

"A fine place and a grand house, plenty of money, and all that money gives, and no place for her only son! I wonder how she likes it all! No, no, I don't: I know she is not happy, and it's my fault, und mis." His face grew darker and more angry, and he shook his clenched hand towards a stately house, whose long lighted facade now became visible.

"And his,—his who married my mother, and deceived her, who gave her hopes he never intended to fulfil,—my ill conduct the cause of his forbidding her to bring me here!—he always hated me; he hated me before he saw me, before he ever knew that I was not a sucking-dove for gentleness, and a pattern of filial obedience and propriety; he hated me because I existed,—because I was my mother's son; and if I had been the most amenable of stepsons, he would have hated me all the same, only he would have shown his hatred differently, that's all. I should have been brought here, and made to feel insignificance, instead of being left to beg or starve, for all he cares. I am better off as it is."

A harsh smile came over of his face for a moment. "Quite a blackguard, and all but a beggar. All but? No, quite a beggar, for I am coming to beg of my mother,—coming to your fine house, Capel Carruthers, like a thief or a spy; slinking in at your gates under cover of your fine friends' fine carriages; a prodigal step-son,—by Jove, without the faintest chance of a welcome, and every probability of being turned out, if discovered. Company here, too, of all nights in the year, to make it more difficult to get hold of old Brookes unsuspected, but not so unfortunate either, if I'm seen. Hangers about are to be found even in the country, I suppose, on festive occasions. There's the house at last! A grand place, grim as it is under the stars, with a twinkling firmament of its own on the ground floor. The lights look warm. Good God, how cold it is out here!" Again he drew back close to the tall, dark stems of the trees, to let a carriage pass; when it had discharged its load under the portico, he emerged cautiously upon the broad carriage sweep by which the company were arriving.

The house was an old one, and was surrounded by a narrow fosse or ditch, which in former days might have been full of water, and used for defensive purposes, but which was now drained and dry, and served as a kind of area, looked into by the windows in the basement. Above this fosse, and stretching away on either side of the heavy portico, was a broad and handsome stone terrace, the left-hand portion of which lay in deep shadow, while the right-hand portion was checkered with occasional light, which made its way through the partially closed shutters of the ball-room. Cautiously crossing the broad drive, and slipping behind a carriage which was just discharging its load at the hall door, George Dallas, the stranger whose fortunes we have so far followed, crept into a dark angle of the porch until the crunching of the gravel and the clanging of the door announced the departure of the carriage, and then, climbing the balustrade of the terrace, and carefully avoiding the lines of light, made his way to the window of the room, and peered in. At first he shook so with the cold that he could not concentrate his attention on what was passing before his eyes; but having groped about and found a small tree which was carefully protected with a large piece of matting, and which flanked one end of the balustrade, he quietly removed the matting, and, wrapping it round him, returned to his position, watching and commenting on the scene of which he was a spectator.

It was an old room on which George Dallas looked,—an old room with panelled walls, surmounted by a curious carved frieze and stuccoed roof, and hung round with family portraits, which gave it a certain grim and stern air, and made the gay hot-house flowers with which it was lavishly decorated seem out of keeping. Immediately opposite the window stood the entrance door, wide open, and flanked by the usual bevy of young men, who, from laziness or bashfulness, take some time to screw their courage up to dancing-point. Close in front of them was a group which at once arrested George Dallas' attention.

It consisted of three persons, of whom two were gentlemen; the third was a young girl, whose small white-gloved hand rested on the arm of the older of her companions, who, as George Dallas caught sight of them, was in the act of presenting the younger to her. The girl was tall, slight, very graceful and elegant, and extremely fair. Her features were not clearly discernible, as she stood sideways towards the window; but the pose of the head, the bend of the neck, the braids of fair hair closely wound around the well-shaped head, and worn without any ornament but its own golden gloss, the sweeping folds of her soft white dress,—all bore a promise of beauty, which, indeed, her face, had he seen it, would have fully realized. He saw her bow, in graceful acknowledgment of the introduction, and then linger for a few minutes talking with the two gentlemen,—to the younger of whom George Dallas paid no attention whatever, after which she moved away with him to join the dancers. The older man stood where she had left him, and at him George Dallas looked with the fixed intensity of anger and hatred.

"There you are," he muttered, "you worthy, respectable, hard-hearted, unblemished gentleman! There you are, with your clear complexion and your iron gray whiskers, with your cold blue eyes and your white teeth, with your thin lips and your long chin, with your head just a little bald, and your ears just a little shrivelled, but not much; with your upright figure, and your nice cool hands, and your nice cool heart, too, that never knew an ungratified lust, or a passion which wasn't purely selfish. There you are, the model of respectability and wealth, and the essence of tyranny and pride! There you are,—and you married my beautiful mother when she was poor, and when her son needed all that she could give him, and more; and you gave her wealth, and a fine house, and fine friends, and your not remarkably illustrious name, and everything she could possibly desire, except the only thing she wanted, and the only thing, as I believe, for which she married you. That's your niece, of course, the precious heiress, the rich and rare young lady who has a place in your house, though the son of its mistress is banished from it. That's the heiress, who probably does not know that I exist. I should not be surprised if he had ordered my mother to conceal the disgraceful fact. Well, the girl is a nice creature, I dare say; she looks like it. But where can my mother be?"

He approached the window still more closely; he ventured to place his face close to the panes for a moment, as he peered anxiously into the room. "Where is my mother?" he thought. "Good Heaven! if she did but know that I am shivering here."

The strains of sweet, clear music reached his ears, floods of light streamed out from the ball-room, a throng of dancers whirled past the window, he saw the soft, fluttering dresses, he heard the rustle of the robes, the sounds of the gay voices, and the ring of laughter, and, ever and anon, as a stray couple fell away from the dance, and lingered near the window, a fair young face would meet his gaze, and the happy light of its youth and pleasure would shine upon him. He lingered, fascinated, in spite of the cold, the misery of his situation, and the imminent risk of detection to which he was exposed. He lingered, and looked, with the longing of youth, for gayety and pleasure; in his case for a simple gayety, a more sinless pleasure, than any he was wont to know. Suddenly he shrank quickly back and clutched hard at the covering of matting in which he had shrouded himself. A figure had crossed the window, between him and the light,—a figure he knew well, and recognized with a beating heart,—a figure clad in purple velvet and decked with gleaming jewels; it was his mother. She passed hastily, and went up to Mr. Carruthers, then talking with another gentleman. She stretched out one jewelled arm, and touched him on the shoulder with her fan. Carruthers turned, and directly faced the window. Then George Dallas flung the matting which had covered him away, and left his hiding-place with a curse in his heart and on his lips.

"Yes, curse you," he said, "you dress her in velvet and diamonds, and make her splendid to entertain your company and flatter your pride, and you condemn her to such misery as only soft-hearted, strong-natured women such as she is can feel all the time. But it won't do, Carruthers; she's my mother, though she's your wife, and you can't change her. I'll have some of your money, tyrant as you are, and slave as she is, before this night is over. I'm a desperate man; you can't make me more miserable than I am, and I can bring you to shame, and I will, too."

He stepped softly to the edge of the terrace, climbed the balustrade, and sat down cautiously on the narrow strip of grass beyond; then felt with his hands along the rough face of the wall which formed the front of the area. He looked down between his feet, the depth was about ten feet, he thought. He might venture to let himself drop. He did so, and came safely on his feet, on the smooth, sanded ground. An angle of the house was close to him; he turned it, and came upon a window whose shutters, like those of the upper range, were unclosed, and through which he could see into the comfortable room beyond. The room was low but large, and the heavy carved presses, the table with green baize cover, the arm-chairs, one at each side of the fire, the serviceable, comfortable, and responsible appearance of the apartment at once indicated its true character. It could be nothing but the housekeeper's room.

In the centre of the table stood an old-fashioned oil lamp, no doubt banished from the upper regions when the moderator made its appearance in society; close to the stand was a large Bible open, a pair of spectacles lying upon the page. A brass-bound desk, a file of receipts, a Tunbridge-ware work-box, and a venerable inkstand were also symmetrically arranged upon the table. The room was empty, and the observer at the window had ample leisure and opportunity to scrutinize it.

"I am in luck," he said. "This is Nurse Ellen's room. There are the dreadful old portraits which she always insisted on keeping over the chimney-piece, and venerated, quite as much because she thought them objects of art as because she fancied them really like my father and mother. There's her Bible, with the date of my birth and christening in it. I dare say those are the identical spectacles which I broke, playing Red Riding Hood's grandmother. I wish she would come in, and come alone. What shall I do if she brings any one with her, and they close the shutters? How delightful the fire looks! I have a great mind to smash the window and get in. No one would hear the noise with all that crashing music overhead, and there does not seem to be a soul on this side of the house."

No sound of footsteps made itself audible on the terrace above his head. He was sheltered a little more in his present position, but still the cold was bitter, and he was shivering. The impulse to break the window grew stronger. He thought how he should avoid cutting his hand; his shabby gloves could not protect him, suppose he were to take off his waistcoat, and twist it around his hand ad arm. He had unfastened one button of his coat, as the idea occurred to him, when a sound overhead, on the house side, caught his ear. It was the click produced by opening the fastening of a French window. Then came steps upon the light balcony, which was one of the modern decorations of the old building, and voices which reached him distinctly.

"Any influenza you may catch, or anything of that kind, you must ascribe to yourself, Miss Carruthers. You would come out this—hum—by Jove—awful night!"

"O, don't fear for me Captain Marsh," said a light girlish voice, laughingly, "I'm Poynings bred, you know, and accustomed to be out in all weathers, so that I run no risk; and though it is wintry enough outside, the temperature of that room was becoming unbearable!"

"Think it must be caused by that old woman's red face that we noticed, or the thingummy—paradise feather in her cap. She with the very thin daughter. Don't you know?"

"Of course I know. The old lady is my aunt, Lady Boldero; the young one is my cousin Blanch!"

"Haw, by Jove, sorry I spoke, haw! By the by, that was Sir Thomas Boldero's park, where I met you riding on Friday, wasn't it, Miss Carruthers?"

"Yes. I was taking a short cut home, as I thought I should be late for dinner."

"You were going a rattling good pace, I noticed. Seemed to have distanced your groom."

"My groom! That's a luxury I very seldom indulge in,—never, when I think I can dispense with it without my uncle's knowledge. It is disagreeable to me to have a man perpetually at my heels!"

"You shouldn't say that, Miss Carruthers,—shouldn't indeed. You don't know how pleasant it is—for the man."

"Very pretty indeed, Captain Marsh! And now that you've had the chance of paying a compliment, and have done it so neatly, we will go back, please. I begin to feel a little chilly."

As the speakers moved, something fell at George Dallas' feet. It was so dark in the corner where he stood that he could not distinguish what it was, until the closing of the window above gave him assurance that he might move in safety. Then he went forward, and found it was a sprig of myrtle. He picked it up, looked at it idly, and put it into the breast-pocket of his miserable coat.

"What a sweet voice she has!" he said. "A sweet face, too, I am sure; it must be so, to match the voice and hair. Well, she has given me something, though she didn't intend it, and will probably never know it. A spirited, plucky girl, I am sure, for all her grace and her blonde style. Carries too many guns for the captain, that's clear!"

He dived down in the midst of his words, for the door of the room into which he had been looking opened quietly, and an elderly woman in a black silk dress entered. After casting a glance around her, she was about to seat herself at the table, when Dallas gave two low taps in quick succession at the window. The woman started and looked toward the spot whence the sound came with a half-keen, half-frightened glance, which melted into mixed astonishment when Dallas placed his face close to the glass and beckoned to her with his hand. Then she approached the window, shading her eyes from the candlelight and peering straight before her. When she was close to the window, she said, in a low, firm voice—

"Who are you? Speak at once, or I'll call for help!"

"It's I, Nurse Ellen. I—"

"Good heavens, Master George!"

"Yes, yes; open the window and let me in. I want to talk to you, and I'm half dead with cold. Let me in. So. That's it."

The woman gently raised the sash, and so soon as the aperture admitted of the passage of his body, he slipped through and entered the room, taking no notice of his old nurse, but making straight for the fire, before which he knelt, gazing hungrily at the flames, and spreading both his hands in eager welcome of the blaze. The old woman closed the window and then came softly behind him, placed her hand on his head, and, leaning over his shoulder and looking into his face, muttered,

"Good Lord, how changed you are, my boy! I should scarcely have known you, except for your eyes, and they're just the same; but in everything else, how changed!"

He was changed indeed. The last time George Dallas had taken farewell of his old nurse, he had parted from her, a big, strong, healthy youth of eighteen, with short, curly brown hair, clear skin, bright complexion, the incarnation of youth and strength and health. He knelt before her now, a gaunt, grizly man, with high cheek-bones and hollow rings round his great brown eyes, with that dead, sodden pallor which a life of London dissipation always produces, and with long, thin, bony hands with which he clutched hold of the old woman, who put her arms round him and seemed inclined to burst into a fit of sobbing.

"Don't do that, nurse! don't do that! I'm weak myself, and seedy, and couldn't stand it. Get me something to drink, will you? And, look here! I must see my mother to-night, at once. I've come from town on purpose, and I must see her."

"She does not know you are here?" asked Mrs. Brookes, while she gazed mournfully at the young man, still kneeling before the fire. "But of course she does not, or you would have told me."

"Of course, of course, Nurse Ellen," said George Dallas, "she knows nothing about it. If I had asked her leave, she would not have dared to give it. How is she, nurse? How does she like her life? She tells me very little of herself when she writes to me, and that's not often." He rose from his knees now, and pulled a ponderous black horsehair chair close to the fire, seated himself in it, and sat huddled together, as though cold even yet, with his feet on the broad old-fashioned fender. "I had to come at my risk. You shall know all about it, nurse; but now you must contrive to tell my mother I'm here."

"How can I do that, Master George?" asked the old woman, in a tone of distress and perplexity. "She is in the ball-room, and all the grand folk are looking at her and talking to her. I can't go in among them, and if I could, she would be so frightened and put about, that master would see in a moment that something had happened. He is never far off where she is."

"Ha!" said George, gloomily; "watches her, does he, and that kind of thing?"

"Well, not exactly," said Mrs. Brookes; "not in a nasty sort of way. I must say, to do him justice, though I don't much like him, that Mr. Carruthers is a good husband; he's fond of her, and proud of her her, and he likes to see her admired."

The young man interrupted her with selfish heedlessness.

"Well, it's a pity he has the chance to-night; but, however it's managed, I must see her. I have to go back to town to-morrow, and of course I can't come about here safely in the daytime. Think of some plan, nurse, and look sharp about it."

"I might go up stairs and join the servants—they are all about the ball-room door—and watch for an opportunity as she passes."

"That will take time," said George, "but it's the best chance. Then, do it, nurse, and give me something to eat while you are away. Will any of the servants come in here? They had better not see me, you know."

"No, you are quite safe; they are looking at the dancing," she answered, absently, and closing as she spoke the shutters of the window by which he had entered. She then left the room, but quickly returned, bringing in a tray with cold meat, bread, and wine. He still sat by the fire, now with his head thrown back against the high, straight back of his chair, and his hands thrust into his pockets."

"Very plain fare, Master George," said the housekeeper, "but I can't find anything better without wasting time."

"Never mind, nurse. I'm not hungry, and I'm not above eating cold meat if I were. Beggars must not be choosers, you know; and I'm little better than a beggar, as you also know. Give me some wine. It isn't felony, is it, though I have got into my step-father's house through the window, and am drinking his wine without his knowledge or consent?"

His tone was very painful to the faithful old woman's ear. She looked at him wistfully, but made no reply. He rose from the chair by the fire, suddenly drew another chair to the table, and sat down by the tray. Mrs. Brooks left the room, and took her way along the white stone passage which led to the entrance hall of the mansion. Passing through a swinging door covered with crimson cloth, she entered a spacious square hall, decorated, after the fashion of country houses, with stags' heads and antlers. The floor was of polished oak, uncarpeted, but at each of the six doors which opened into it lay a soft white rug. A bright fire blazed in the ample grate; and through the open door of the ball-room light and the sound of music poured into the hall. A number of servants were standing about, some lingering by the fire, a few ranged close to the door of the dancing-room, exchanging comments upon the performances with perfect impunity. Under cover of the music Mrs. Brooks joined the group, which respectfully gave way at her approach, and ceded to her the front place. She looked anxiously, and for some time vainly, for her mistress.

At length she perceived her, but she was seated at the further end of the room, in conversation with an elderly lady of extraordinary magnificence in point of apparel, and who required to be spoken to through an ear-trumpet. Mrs. Carruthers was not a skillful performer upon that instrument, and was obliged to give her whole mind to it, so that there was little chance of her looking in any other direction than the unInviting one of Mrs. Chittenden's ear for the present. Mrs. Brookes looked on impatiently, and longed for a break in the dancing, and a consequent movement among the company. At length the music ceased, the panting waltzers subsided into promenade, and Mrs. Carruthers rose to place her chair at the disposal of a young lady whose exertions had told upon her, and who breathlessly accepted the boon. As she stood for a moment turned toward the door, she caught sight of the housekeeper's face, and saw she looked pale and agitated. Catching her mistress' eye, the housekeeper made a slight, stealthy sign. Very gracefully, and with perfect calm, the tall figure, in its sweeping velvet dress, made its way through the dispersed groups between it and the door, from which all the servants had precipitately retreated at the cessation of the music. What was wrong? Mrs. Carruthers thought. Something, she knew must be wrong, or Ellen would not be there beckoning to her. A second gesture, still more stealthy and warning, caused her to pause when within reach of the housekeeper's whisper, without turning her head towards her.

"What is it, Ellen?"

"Hush! where is master? Can he see you?"

"Yes, he is just beyond the screen. What is the matter?"

"Turn round, and stoop; let me tie your shoe—there!"

Mrs. Carruthers stood in the doorway, and bent her head, holding her foot out, and lifting her dress. Mrs. Brookes fumbled with the shoe, as she whispered rapidly—

"Come as soon as you can to my room. Be careful that you are not missed. Some one is there who wants to see you."

"To see me, Ellen? On such a night, and at such an hour! What is wrong? Who is there?"

The old woman looked earnestly into the frightened face, bending over her, and said rather with her lips than with her voice—

"Master George!"

THE PRETTY FACES OF THE LADIES.—How vain must be all the reasoning of the sage or the moralist who would persuade a beautiful woman that it is wrong to admire herself! It is always so much better when we are teaching, to teach only what is possible; and it is not possible for such a woman to look in the glass and not see that she is beautiful. A thousand tongues will be always ready to tell her that she is so, and she will necessarily read this pleasant fact upon the countenances of all who regard her with attention. As well might the guardian of youth insist that the sun was not shining at noon to-day, or say that if we close our eyes it will be night as attempt to persuade a beautiful girl neither to see her own charms nor to admire them. The only good thing to be done in such a case is to admit the fact honestly and fairly—to confess frankly that you think the girl beautiful, and that you admire her face, so far as beauty goes, but no further. There is the point to stop at—to convince her that a beautiful face can do very little for her beyond pleasing for awhile, and that if it pleases some, it will inevitably vex others, making for her enemies as well as friends. Nor need it prove difficult, if honestly and fairly done, to convince her of the very limited value of beauty, as regards herself; that it will never make her amiable or intelligent, or even amusing; that it will never help a friend in perplexity or distress, never alleviate suffering, never so much as enliven domestic intercourse, nor do the slightest thing for her or others that is noble or great, generous or kind; and beyond all, that, as regards her own share of the beauty, it will inevitably fade and die away, leaving, in all probability, no trace behind. It may be said that this is already the habitual way of treating beauty in the young, and a very disagreeable way too. I freely grant that it is disagreeable, where this is all; and I think I have observed in some well-meaning people a little tendency to taunt and sneer at beauty, as if it were nothing, or worse than nothing; which it is not. And I would especially ask attention to what I have pointed out as a necessary prelude to these unpalatable remarks—viz: a candid and hearty recognition of beauty, even personal beauty, wherever it exists; nay, also a cordial admiration of it as something delightful and worthy of being admired, but only for what it is really worth.

SHAKSPEARE'S HEROINES.—It is remarkable that the daughters of Shakspeare's plays with whom we are most acquainted—Desdemona, Juliet, Jessica, Hero, Miranda, Rosalind, Celia, and Portia—have neither brother nor sister. Each of them is the only child of her parents. Ophelia has no sister. With the exception of Juliet, they are all motherless. Although Lady Capulet talks of her age, she was only twenty-eight when she proposed to her daughter the acceptance of Paris' hand. There is no confiding love between Juliet and her mother. On the contrary, she is reserved and secret, keeping her a stranger to her thoughts. Lady Macbeth stands distinctly apart from the other females of Shakspeare's, knowing no kin, as if authoress of herself; yet she is restrained by reverential awe when, intent on evil, she casts her eyes upon the image of her sleeping father. Jessica is insensible to any such touch of natural tenderness. The daughters of Lear, with their deformity, scarcely surpass her in cruelty and filial impiety. She betrays her father, plunders his house, bears off his family remembrances, elopes with his enemies, and the enemies of his race. Even the ring of Leah, on which she knew his old age doted, she profanely exchanges for a monkey; and, in the end, consorts and feasts amid exultations over his overthrow and ruin. Desdemona is an unkind daughter. She deceives and clandestinely, in the night, deserts her father's house for the "sooty bosom of a Moor." The match was mortal to him—grief of it broke his heart. In all her subsequent career, in sunshine and storm, and even in the last memorable evening in his bed-chamber, alone with Amelia, when her thoughts recur to her childhood, and the memories of her mother, and her mother's maid, Barbara, rise up before her, she has not a tear, nor a word of pity or tenderness, or even a thought for her neglected and languishing father.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications:]

It is not often that the Westminster Review is guilty of such crude and fustian criticism as is contained in the notice of Felix Holt, in its July number. There are few newspapers even, of the slightest literary pretensions, that would publish such feeble and inappreciative "criticism" as the following:

Further, we think that since the term "Radical" so conspicuously challenges attention on the title-page, and since, too, in the Introduction we are reminded that the action took place thirty-five years ago, some of the characteristics of the time should have been more clearly reproduced. Toryism then meant wealth to the landlord, and starvation to the peasant. Toryism then meant ignorance for the poor, and brute force for the rich. It fact, Toryism too often meant pleasure enjoyed by the few regardless of the sufferings of the many. It was this injustice that made many a hero and martyr throughout the Midland counties, a bitter sense of wrong that raised many a village Hampden; and we feel the necessity of some dark background of this kind, as both a cause of and foil to the rugged earnestness and nobleness of Felix Holt.

We are asked for what is difficult, but we think we have some right to ask it from the author of "Romola." We judge her by a very different standard to that by which we should judge any other novelist. And if we point out what we regard as further defects, it is not from a spirit of fault finding, but rather as indicating the perfection which we expect from George Eliot. In the first place, then, we think that the early relations between Mrs. Transome and Mr. Jermyn should have been given more in detail. After we have finished the story we feel that we are without the true starting point. We are left to imagine motives as best we may, and to judge without any true means of judging. This, in our opinion, is a fault in art. Again, too, we think there is somewhat too much of a straining after profound sayings. It may be our fault, but we certainly cannot understand such a sentence as—"The sins which Rufus Lyon had to pray against had been those of personal ambition and those of a too restless intellect, ceaselessly urging questions concerning the mystery of that which was assuredly revealed, and thus hindering the due nourishment of the soul on the substance of the truth delivered." (Vol. i. p. 145.) Again, too, the following sentence contains far too much shell in comparison to the pearl—"The sensitive little minister knew instinctively that words which would cost him efforts as painful as the obedient footsteps of a bleeding hound that wills a foreseen throe, would fall on this man as the pressure of tender fingers falls on a brazen glove." (Vol. i. 301.) Further, we have to express a difference of opinion from some of her statements. Thus the following appears to be only a half-truth: "All knowledge which alters our lives penetrates us more when it comes in the early morning: the day that has to be traveled with something new and, perhaps, forever sad in its light, is an image of the life that spreads beyond. But at night the time of rest is near. (Vol. ii. 161.) There are still other minor blemishes—a certain thinness of thought in passages, and some rather strained jokes which might be pointed out—did we not know how easily the world can pick out faults, but with what difficulty beauties.

Imagine what ideas of art the critic must possess who suggests "not from a spirit of fault-finding, but rather as indicative the perfection which we expect from George Eliot," that "the early relations between Mrs. Transome and Mr. Jermyn should have been given more in detail!" It is fortunate, indeed, that the author's ideas on the subject were widely different from those of her critic.

The following extracts from Mr. Swinburne's new volume, will serve to furnish some notion of its spirit and quality:

FROM THE HYMN TO PROSERPINE.

"O gods dethroned and deceased, cast forth, wiped out in a day!
From your wrath is the world released, redeemed from your chains men say.
New gods are crowned in the city, their flowers have broken your rods.
They are merciful, clothed with pity, the young compassionate gods.
But for me their new device is barren, the days are bare;
Things long past over suffice, and men forgotten that were. . .

"Wilt thou yet take all, Galilæan? But these thou shalt not take,
The laurel, the palms, and the pæan, the breasts of the nymphs in the brake;
Breasts more soft than a dove's, that tremble with tenderer breath;
And all the wings of the Loves, and all the joy before death.
More than these wilt thou give, things fairer than all these things?
Nay, for a little we live, and life hath mutable wings. . . .

"Thou hast conquered, O pale Galilæan, the world has grown gray from thy breath. . . .

"Though all men abase them before you in spirit, and all knees bend,
I kneel not, neither adore you, but, standing, look to the end.

"Though the feet of thine high priests tread where thy lords and our forefathers trod;
Though these that were gods are dead, and thou being dead art a god,
Though before thee the throned Cytherean be fallen, and hidden her head,
Yet thy kingdom shall pass, Galilæan, thy dead shall go down to the dead."

FROM VERSES "TO DOLORES."

Cold eyelids that hide like a jewel
Hard eyes that grow soft for an hour;
The heavy white limbs and the cruel
Red mouth like a venomous flower;
When these are gone by with their glories
What shall rest of thee then, what remain,
O mystic and sombre Dolores,
Our Lady of Pain?
* * * * *
By the ravenous teeth that have smitten
Through the kisses that blossom and bud,
By the lips intertwisted and bitten
Till the foam has a savor of blood;
By the pulse as it rises and falters,
By the hands as they slacken and strain,
I adjure thee respond from thine altars,
Our Lady of Pain.
* * * * *
Thy skin changes country and color,
And shrivels or swells to a snake's.
Let it brighten and bloat and grow duller,
We know it, the flames and the flakes,
Red brands on it smitten and bitten,
Round skies where a star is a stain,
And the leaves with thy litanies written,
Our Lady of Pain.
* * * * *
Where are they, Cotytto or Venus,
Astarte or Ashtaroth, where?
Do their hands as we touch come between us?
Is the breath of them hot in thy hair?
From their lips have thy lips taken fever,
With the blood of their bodies grown red?

The following, regarded from a purely artistic stand point, is wonderfully fine, though its spirit is unmistakably Pagan;

NO SIGN.

For none shall move the most high gods,
Who are most sad, being cruel; none
Shall break or take away the rods
Wherewith they scourge us, not as one
That smites a son. . . .

When have they heard us, who hath known
Their faces, climbed into their feet,
Felt them and found them? Laugh or groan,
Doth heaven remurmur and repeat
Sad sounds or sweet?

Do the stars answer? in the night
Have ye found comfort? or by day
Have ye seen gods? What hope, what light,
Falls from the farthest starriest way
On you that pray?

Are the skies wet because we weep,
Or fair because of any mirth?
Cry out; they are gods; perchance they sleep;
Cry; thou shalt know what prayers are worth,
Thou dust and earth.

Alluding to this volume, the New York Nation of September 6th, says:

"The power of the critical press has lately received a signal illustration in the withdrawal from circulation of Mr. Swinburne's 'Poems and Ballads.' The unequivocally, and sometimes unjustly, expressed disgust with which the literary papers received it, has had its effect. We are curious to see whether the American edition, now nearly out, will be suppressed also."

We venture to predict that the American edition will not "be suppressed also."

Miss Braddon's new magazine, Belgravia, is to commence during the present month. Its chief feature will be a novel from her pen, entitled Birds of Prey. Among her principal contributors are mentioned Charles Reade, whose Griffith Gaunt, in the Atlantic Monthly, has so greatly scandalized prudish readers; Mr. Winwood Reade, his nephew, the author of a very readable work on Africa; Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, novelist and biographer; Mr. Robert Buchanan, the young Scottish poet; Mr. Mortimer Collins, a brother of the Collins; and Mr. George Augustus Sala, who will continue his Streets of the World, a series of papers begun in Temple Bar.

Christina Rossetti, whose volume of poems has been already noticed in the Californian, and to whom her more enthusiastic admirers are disposed to assign even a higher place among the sisterhood of song than that of Mrs. Browning or Adelaide Proctor, lives in London, and is, it is said, an intimate friend of her sister poetess, Miss Jean Ingelow. She is not young, as one might have inferred from her poetry, but is religious and charitable, living a quiet and reserved life.

A very remarkable book has recently been published at Paris, in which the author endeavors to prove that the destiny of the human race is influenced by the earth's magnetism. In like manner as the zodiacal light, shooting stars and other natual phenomena are referable to an effect of magnetism, so are great events in the history of nations and of individuals. For example, the 9th of November is the day of least magnetic circulation, and the least physical and moral energy, while the 22d of June is the day of most circulation and most energy. The 18th Brumaire (November 9) was a memorable day in the life of the First Consul—the 22d of June saw the finish of the Empire. Then, again, it is to magnetism that several great moral movements are due—Teutonism in Prussia, Anglicanism in England, Galicanism in France and Catholicism in the Papal States.

The book is entitled, "Manifeste du Magnetisme du Globe et du l' Humanite." The author states, in substance, that he expects to create a sensation, and that he is "prepared for clamor, and to be teacher as a dreamer." We suspect that so far as the "sensation" and the "clamor" are concerned, he is destined to meet with a humiliating disappointment.

Among the new works announced by Ticknor & Fields, of Boston, as in preparation and to be published during the Autumn, the following are the most noteworthy:

"Flower-de-Luce," by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow; "Religious Poems," by Harriet Beecher Stowe; "The Tent on the Beach, and other Poems," by John G. Whittier; "Evangeline," by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow; "The Prose Writings of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow;" "The Vision of Sir Launfal," by James Russell Lowell; "Maud Muller," by John G. Whittier; "Lectures on Greece, Ancient and Modern," by the late President C. C. Felton; "The Diamond Tennyson," a New and Complete Edition of Tennyson's Poems, in one volume; "The Picture of St. John," by Bayard Taylor. "The Prose Writings of John G. Whittier;" "Griffith Gaunt; or, Jealousy," by Charles Reade; "The Biglow Papers," by James Russell Lowell; Second Series; "The Yankee in Canada," by Henry D. Thoreau; "Treasures from Milton's Prose Writings;" "The Life of James Gates Percival," by Julius H. Ward; "Character and Characteristic Men," by Edwin P. Whipple; "The Poetical Works of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow.

CORRESPONDENCE.

WHAT WAS THE "TRICLINIUM?"

San Francisco, Oct. 2, 1866.

MR. EDITOR: Sir,—I was much surprised to see, on reading the last number of The Californian, that you were copying the display of ignorance made by the Alta regarding the discoveries of Pompeii—that paper having transformed the Roman word, triclinium, into "triuclinium"—a word not found in the Roman language. Had the editor of the Alta been a classic, he would have known that triclinium meant the couch on which the guests reclined at dinner. Again: the Alta states that "The walls of the triclinium were decorated with paintings;" that is, the walls of a couch were decorated with paintings! Had the Alta editor been acquainted with classical literature, he would have known that the Romans did not eat their meals in a triclinium, but in a room dedicated to that purpose called the Cœnaculum, the walls of which might be decorated with paintings, as I have seen in the pictures of Cœnacula found in Herculaneum. Having been intimately acquainted with Roman history for thirty years past, and having written and published a large work on the subject, I cannot see the domestic life and habits of my old Roman friends so misrepresented by ignorance, without taking some notice of it. If the editor of the Alta wishes to gain some information on the domestic life and habits of the Romans, I would recommend him to read the biography of Gallus, the friend of Horace, who lived in the reign of Augustus, at the most refined period of the Roman empire. Yours very truly, F. H.

We think our correspondent is unjustly severe upon the Alta. The paragraph in which the error indicated occurs, is not editorial. It is a "clipping," and the "scissors man" of the Alta is not responsible for it. Indeed, he would have had no right, in strict journalistic etiquette, to have corrected the error had he been aware of it. He might have noted it by way of critical comment; but his neglect to do this does not fairly imply even that he was ignorant of the blunder.

ART IN SAN FRANCISCO.

To the Editor of the Californian:

It has often been remarked that the people of our city have little or no genuine love of art, and are chary in their patronage of anything tending to its advancement.

Paintings are purchased here in numbers that are surprising and at prices that are fabulous, viewing the habits and disposition of our people; but, when the merit of the purchases is considered, their number and price form a sad commentary on the taste of the buyers. They buy because it is fashionable, and from a desire for so much furniture, rather than from eagerness to possess that which pleases the æsthetic sense and satisfies an innate longing for what is beautiful. In our parlors are seen many costly engravings, with, here and there, a truly excellent painting; but they also contain a countless multitude of wretched pictures, which, in older cities, where art has found a more attractive home, would not be deemed worthy of a frame.

That this state of things exists is due mainly to the fact that we have had little to educate the taste of the community, nothing to draw forth and sustain that latent appreciation of everything tending to elevate and refine our natures, which needs but cultivation to kindle it into active existence.

We have few artists—none of great ability; no public galleries of paintings; and the few private collections of any merit, are inaccessible to strangers. The attempts to inaugurate art exhibitions in this city have failed, not for want of paintings, but on account of the utter worthlessness, with some exceptions, of the pictures exhibited.

Having few or no opportunities to learn, if ignorant, what is really good, or, if cultivated, to buy it, our people must refuse to buy home productions, or quench their thirst for the beautiful with engravings and photographs—artistic enough, perhaps, in themselves, but reproduced till the eye tires of seeing them; or with paintings by a squad of tyros who, deficient alike in genius and education, have come here, not to study art for its own sake, but to cover canvas with pigments at so much the square foot.

With perhaps the grandest scenery that ever engaged an artist's brush; an atmosphere lending an ever varied beauty to the view; a climate permitting almost unlimited study of Nature; a field almost untrodden by painters of skill and repute; a wealthy people whose tastes need only to be guided to draw from them a liberal encouragement, we have everything to attract an artist to our shores; yet we have had scarcely one of more than average ability.

We recognize the difficulty of genius developing itself in this expensive country, where every hour must be devoted to earning bread and butter, or seem to violate the established rule of society. This condition of things is inconsistent with the poetic ideal of art life. Nevertheless we object to supporting unfledged artists who, while laboring with the diligence of sign painters, forget their art in their love of money, and flood the city with crude and hasty apologies for pictures, that tend somewhat to satiate the people's desire, yet fail to elevate their taste. Such men prostitute a noble calling; they exert no beneficial influence on society. Art is not the road to fortune, and though great artists may earn it, none ever made it his sole ambition.

What we want to awaken amongst our people is an appreciation of art, and to lead them to give to its devotees a generous patronage, is a class of artists who will labor with a true love of art itself, whose ambition is not to paint and sell quickly, but to attain that eminence and achieve that honor awaiting deserving genius everywhere.

Not until we are rid of the money-seekers and have among us good, earnest, and ambitious men of genius; not until the growth of a spurious taste for the hasty, cheap, and gaudy productions of unskilled workmen, has been discouraged and checked by the exhibition of that which is true to Nature and art—that which is born of something more than paint and canvas; which is the creation of a true, poetic, and artistic soul—will our people learn to know the true from the untrue in art, and be brought to that standard of culture and refinement when it can be no longer truly said that they are devoid of appreciation, and wanting in the perception of the beautiful. THE "ROUND TABLE."

To the Editor of the Californian:

DEAR SIR:—In the last number of the Round Table, which you have very justly characterized as "the most enormously pretentious journal in America," I find the followiug:

To the Editor of the Round Table:

DEAR SIR:—Can you or any of your readers inform me, through the columns of your valuable paper, where the quotation,

"A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind,"

can be found? Yours truly, PH. B. V.

PHILADELPHIA, August 27, 1866.

To this query, the eminently literary editor of this pre-eminently literary periodical, replies as follows:

"If not in Pope, in some of the writers of his period."

It is scarcely necessary to inform any tolerably well read person that the line in question occurs in the first edition of Byron's English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

In the last revision by Byron himself, the passage reads:

"Shall gentle Coleridge pass unnoticed here,
To turgid ode and tumid stanza dear?
Though themes of innocence amuse him best;
Yet, still, obscurity's a welcome guest.
If Inspiration should her aid refuse
To him who takes a pixy for a muse,
Yet none in lofty numbers can surpass
The bard who soars to elegize an ass;
So well the subject suits his noble mind
He brays, the laureate of the long-eared kind."

This last line in all former editions reads,

"A fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind,"

a line which I think will be sought for in vain, either "in Pope" or in any of "the writers of his period."

Yours truly, TIMON TICKLER.

SAN FRANCISCO, September 5, 1866.

To the Editor of the Californian:

DEAR SIR:—Will you be kind enough to inform me whether Edmund Yates, the author of Land at Last, and Black Sheep, is the same individual who was expelled from a London club some years since in consequence of a difficulty with Thackeray, who was a member of the same club?

Yours, etc., W. H. L. B.

The author of Land at Last is the individual referred to by our correspondent; but we are not certain whether the difficulty resulted in his actual expulsion from the club.

To the Editor of the Californian:

DEAR SIR:—Some weeks since, I noticed in one of the literary papers published in this city, an allusion to Tennyson's "Lady of Shallott," in which it was remarked that said poem was "an allegory," and that "not one literary man in a hundred pretended to have any definite idea of its meaning."

Without assuming to be "a literary man" I confess that I have never understood the poem in question. Can you furnish the key to it? AN ADMIRER OF TENNYSON.

We have a tolerably well defined notion of the meaning of the "Lady of Shallott," though it is quite possible that the author would repudiate our interpretation. But our correspondent's communication comes to hand too late to afford us time to furnish our views on the subject this week.

To the Editor of the Californian:

DEAR SIR:—Can you inform a reader of THE CALIFORNIAN where the lines,

"Like dropping buckets into empty wells
And growing old in drawing nothing up," occur? I have searched for them in vain, and made fruitless inquiries as to their authorship of all my literary friends.

HAWTHORNE STREET.

The lines are Cowper's, and they occur, we think, somewhere in "The Task."

AMUSEMENTS.

AT the Opera House on Monday evening Madame Celeste personated the double part of "Ernest de la Garde," and the gipsy "Zambaro," in the House on the Bridge, and achieved a notable success in the characters; both of which were sustained with marked ability. On Wednesday The French Spy was brought out; Celeste playing the protean part of "Henri St. Alme," a character written for and created by her, with remarkable grace, expression and effectiveness; and with a laudable freedom from that courseness of assumption given to the character by most of its more modern representatives. For which latter merit may we long keep her memory green. The French Spy was repeated on Thursday evening. Last evening was set aside for Celeste's benefit, and a densely crowded house was the result of the appeal.

But few more occasions will be offered to see Madame Celeste before her departure, which will take place on the 10th instant, as she leaves on the next Panama steamer for Australia.

To-day The French Spy for Celeste's last matinée. This evening Green Bushes, which will be repeated on Monday and Tuesday evenings for her last performances.

On Wednesday evening next Miss Alice Kingsbury will make her début at the Opera House as "Fanchon," in The Cricket. The lady is said to be young, versatile, vivacious and attractive—as fresh and charming as the flowers of May—and the possessor withal of dramatic ability far above the ordinary standard of young actresses. The New York Sunday Mercury says: "As 'Fanchon' she stands without a rival." And calls her a "bewitching little combination of talent, beauty and grace." If the Mercury speaks true, these are rare gifts and must prove very popular ones for their happy possessor.

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.—The public and the management were amply rewarded for their patience under the annoying postponement of La Juive. by the unexampled perfection and magnificence with which it was finally produced, on Wednesday evening, to a crowded and fashionable house. The new scenery and accessories, splendid costumes, and crowd of supernumeraries, indicate to the most superficial observer that no expense has been spared to lend to Halevy's great work the aid of its appropriate and gorgeous mise en scene; but the musical difficulties, enormous in extent, and only overcome by weeks of patient and persistent rehearsal, can be but faintly appreciated, even by the favored few who have watched those rehearsals far into the "small hours," and noted the earnest good will with which the artists. conductor, stage manager, chorus, and orchestra, all worked together to perfect the general result. The grandeur and beauty of the music, to say nothing of its novelty, and the spectacular magnificence of the pieces, should give La Juive a long and remunerative run. It was repeated last night, and will be performed for the third time this evening.

The English Opera season on off nights by the Howson troupe has met with very inadequate support. Der Freischutz was creditably given on Tuesday and Thursday evenings to poor houses.

The Winter season at the Metropolitan will open, under the auspices of Birrell & Co., managers. with the famous Ravel-Martinetti troupe of twenty-four performers, who are to leave New York on the 20th inst., for this city. Heller, the great magician, will be the succeeding attraction.

"MARK TWAIN'S" Lecture on the Sandwich Islands, on Tuesday evening at the Academy of Music, was a splendid success. From the time the lecturer made his peculiar bow to the public and commenced to relate his "trouble" with his orchestra—a recreant wretch of a trombone player who, after being engaged to play, declared he "wouldn't stand and toot out tunes to an audience" unless he had other musicians and instruments to accompany him—until the close of the lecture he had his audience perfectly under his command. The public assembled with the expectation of being pleased, and we will venture the assertion that scarcely one out of an audience of twelve or thirteen hundred, was disappointed in that expectation.

The peculiarities of the lecture consisted of the graphic manner in which the information was given concerning the resources and products of the Islands. and the salient traits and habits of the Islanders commented on; interspersed with that constant undercurrent of humor—so characteristic of the speaker—breaking forth when least expected. and keeping his audience constantly on the qui vive, and in a semi state of merriment. Other notable points were the marked and individual style in which the lecture was delivered; the peculiar gestures and tones so characteristic of humor and originality—so unmistakably natural and unstudied—without any straining after effect; all of which served to give a genuine zest and relish to "Mark Twain's" lecture far more palatable than that which characterized that pun-seasoned effort of Artemus Ward's, the Babes in the Wood.

As "Mark" will shortly deliver his lecture before the Sacramentonians, and, in due course of time, repeat it here, we, for obvious reasons, will not give a synopsis of it, or attempt to do it justice in detail. We can only add that the town is ringing with its praises; and that "Mark Twain," the lecturer, will henceforth enjoy as wide a recognition as "Mark Tawin," the humorous writer.

DISCIPLINE OF CHILDREN.

PEOPLE are, nowadays, a great deal more tender in the discipline of children than their grandmothers and grandfathers used to be, or even farther back, if one likes to go into the general region known as the "times of our ancestors." But we doubt whether the result of tender discipline has been to produce more dutiful sons and daughters, or better people, on the whole, than resulted from a mode of treatment which did not consider a child degraded by being treated as a creature whose proper position was one of subjection.

In the present days parents are apt to treat their children far too much as if they were of equal consideration with themselves. Albert or Edith (we suppose the old typical names of John and Mary are for evermore extinct) must have a voice in all matters concerning him or her. There is no longer a ruling power of parents, and a little governed community of children; but, as a lady of much experience remarked in our hearing, the Scriptural injunction of "children, obey your parents" is translated in modern practice into "Parents, obey your children." When this subversion of the proper order of things takes place, there can be no true discipline. It is only where the parents (and in the case of young children, the mother especially) exercise wise and firm rule that discipline can be really said to exist.

It is sometimes imagined that the training of children in habits of obedience, and other good things, can be safely put off till the child is some years old. Nothing can be a more fatal mistake. A very young child indeed can preceive when it may have its own way, and when not: and baby, who has everything he cries for, will not be an obedient or easily trained "Master Albert" at the age of three.

No doubt the exercise of judicious discipline is a dificult thing, and involves a great amount of self-denial on the part of parents. It is so much easier to yield than to be firm, and it is hard to know how to be firm without being harsh. But, if the results of good discipline be desirable of attainment, than it is good to endeavor to exercise such judicious government and training. Even with care and watchfulness on the part of parents, children do not always become all that is good—a fact everybody is only too well aware of. But without these, and without the judicious government of children, as children, parents have no right to complain. when children show no signs of being able to walk in good ways, in which their feet have never been set.

NEURALGIA.—People suffer weeks, even months of torture, with neuralgia, and Dr. Bourne thinks nothing whatever of effecting perfect cures in ten or fifteen days; sometimes "bad cases" are cured in a week. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. *

RHEUMATISM.—If there is a doctor in this town who can cure rheumatism, surely, quickly, pleasantly, and is certain enough in his promises to guarantee them, it is Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. *

ASK HIM.—If you wish to know why the use of drugs and medicines are pernicious, and contrary to reason and common sense, and cannot discover it otherwise, ask Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, and you will be very likely to find out. He can also tell you that disease is much easier cured without medicines than with them, as more than twenty-five years' experience has taught him. *

DR. BOURNE'S BATHS, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. If any person is so ill-informed as to suppose that the miserable Russian Persian or Turkish bath has any resemblance to the scientific character of that of Dr. Bourne, let him only once have a demonstration of the quality of the Russian, Persian, Turkish or Digger Indian style. All intelligent persons recognize the superiority of the Masonic Temple article. *

RHEUMATISM.—Thousands of persons who have saturated themselves with quack nostrums, run the gauntlet of the "regulars," made themselves as "slimy as the crawling reptile in the mud baths," or drank the waters which resembleth "decayed hen fruit," and all to no purpose, have then taken a few of "Dr. Bourne's Baths" and been speedily and permanently cured. They cure where all else fails. Cures guaranteed for stipulated prices; and that does not mean patch-work, but cures. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. Also, neuralgia, fever and ague, dropsy, etc. *

CORRECT, IS IT NOT?—When an allopathic or medicine doctor is "taken sick," you will immediately see a score or less of one, two, four, or no-horse doctors rushing to his assistance. Is it because they have no confidence in themselves, or in their system? Mark the difference When Dr. Bourne, the Water Cure Doctor, becomes an invalid, he has that well-founded confidence in the immutable principles and certainty of his system, and his own knowledge and experience, than he will be his own doctor; judging that if he is not capable of doctoring himself, he is not fit to doctor you. Is that not correct? No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. *

PURGATIVE PILLS have become a settled necessity with the American people. Indeed, cathartics always have been and always must be used, in some form, by all mankind. In this country, the pilular form of administration has been growing in favor since pills were first made of Aloes and Rhubarb, rolled into a ball. Their high position in the public confidence has finally been secured and fastened into permanency, by AYER'S CATHARTIC PILLS. the most skillful combination of medicine for the diseases they are intended to cure, that science can devise or art produce. Those who need pills, no longer hesitate what pills to take if they can get Ayer's Pills.—[Wheeling (Va.) Press.

FACTS IN THE HISTORY OF WATER CURE ON THE PACIFIC.—It is very singular, yet true, that not one of a number of persons claiming to have been pupils of Dr. Thrall's Hydropathic College, and professing to hold his diplomas, who have located at various points on this Coast during the past seven years, after continual ups and downs, maintain their original location, and in fact it is not an easy affair to find any one of them at this present writing. From which facts Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, argues either that Dr. Thrall's system must be sadly inefficient, or that his pupils must sadly discredit his teachings. No other conclusion can be arrived at. It must be distinctly understood that Dr. Bourne never was a pupil of Dr. Thrall, but believes he was in practice before him some years, and has a far better system of treatment, or he would probable have fared the fate of Thrall's pupils, and been a source of amusement to the allopathic doctors, instead of being a thorn in their flesh. Dr. Bourne has been a permanent resident of San Francisco during, say fourteen years, and has removed only twice in nearly twelve years. *

"ON TRANSLATING THE DIVINA COMMEDIA."

I LIFT mine eyes; and all the windows blaze
With forms of Saints and holy men who died,
Here martyred and hereafter glorified;
And the great Rose upon its leaves displays
Christ's Triumph, and the angelic roundelays,
With splendor upon splendor multiplied;
And Beatrice again at Dante's side,
No more rebukes, but smiles her words of praise.
And then the organ sounds, and unseen choirs
Sing the old Latin hymns of peace and love
And benedictions of the Holy Ghost;
And the melodious bells among the spires
O'er all the house tops and through heaven above
Proclaim the elevation of the Host!

Atlantic Monthly. H. W. LONGFELLOW.

THE GROCER'S STORY.

"I WAS a young man, and a poor one then, and had a hard struggle to make my little shop keep my family. It was only by pinching and saving, and keeping a sharp look-out for every bargain, that I managed it at all. We lived in a shabby little street, and had only very poor customers. A loaf of bread, a quarter of a pound of butter, and two ounces of black tea was quite an order; and most of those that came wanted trust.

"One day when I had been to the market I brought home half a dozen hams and hung them up about the door, more for show than anything else, for hams was a good holiday dinner in those regions, and not an every-day affair, I can tell you. They went off slowly, as I thought they would. Now and then some one would come in for a pound, and once I sold half of the smallest one to a woman who wanted it for her Sunday dinner. She was to pay me on Monday morning, but she never did, for on Sunday night her husband killed her with a rum bottle, and they took her body past my shop with its poor head all beaten out of shape.

"And so the hams hung there through the summer, and through the fall, and quite on into the winter.

"It was just as the December nights began to grow long and dark and cold, that I noticed a new policeman on our beat—a young handsome-looking fellow, with very bright eyes, but with such thin cheeks and hands, although he seemed to be powerfully built and made for a rather stout man, that I could not help watching him and wondering whether he had been ill or not. The first time that I noticed him was about sunset, and he passed and repassed my window a dozen times, looking all the while straight at those hams which dangled from the frame of the awning. 'I hope he means to buy one,' I said to my wife, as we sat together over the tea-table; 'and I shouldn't wonder if he did, for he seems to have taken quite a fancy to them.'

"But the evening passed, and though I saw him every now and then on the other side of the way, looking across with his bright eyes straight at the hams, he did not come in or speak to me on the subject. And so I made up my mind that he would send for it in the morning, and somehow made so sure of it that whenever I saw a decent-looking woman go by with a basket on her arm, I said: "That's the policeman's wife coming after the ham." I was mistaken, however; and after the street lamps were lighted I began to see the man pacing up and down, up and down, up and down, with his eyes still fixed as they had been the night previous upon the hams. Once he caught me peeping at him, and then he turned so red and looked at me with such a wolfish glitter in his eyes, that I grew angry, and said to myself: "It's well that keeping unsaleable articles isn't a crime in this country, for if it was I should expect to be arrested.' So I gave him back his look, turned on my heel, and walked back into the shop. I did not see him again that night; but long after everything had been taken in and locked up, and I was snug in bed, I heard a tramp, tramp, tramp, upon the pavement, and knew it was the new policeman, and that he was looking at the hooks where the hams hung, as well as though I had seen him.

"On the third evening he was there again; that you may say was no wonder, for it was his duty to be upon that beat and no other; but it was curious that he should keep on staring at those hams with those bright wolfish eyes of his. I didn't like it, though I couldn't have said why. A vessel had been wrecked at sea about that time, and an extra, with the latest news of the disaster, came out that evening I bought a paper, and sat down behind the counter to read it. It was a stormy night, and but few customers came in, and those were easily served, and somehow, between reading and thinking, time passed on, until the clock struck eleven, and I had not yet taken in my goods or put up my shutters.

"Just as I was about to do so, (in fact I had already put my hand upon the first piece of the shutter) my door opened, and an old woman came in. She was a sottish, miserable creature, known about the place as Irish Kate, and, with her red nose and bleared eyes and bloated limbs, was as ugly a figure as any one ever cast eyes upon. 'Another dram, I suppose,' I said to myself, going behind the bar at once, for I wanted to get rid of her as soon as possible. But she, to my surprise, came close up to me, and put her great red paw upon my arm.

"'I've made a diskivery, mister,' she said. 'You've not been keeping a bright lookout as ye should; there's been a thafe at work widout this blessed night.'

"'What thief!' I asked.

"'More than I can tell ye,' she answered. 'But I think its a policeman, no less, the blackguard.'

"'A policeman!' I cried, and my thoughts flew at once to the man I had seen staring at my hams.

"'It's too dark to see his face,' she said; 'but I caught the shine of a star on the coat he had on, and who iver it was took a ham from your pegs and hid it in the ash-box beyant the cornor. Ye'll find it there, if ye look; and now ye'll not refuse an old woman a sup o' whisky for the information?'

"I gave the old creature what she wanted, hurried her out of the shop and put up the shutters, growing angry every moment.

"'If it is the policeman I'll make him pay dearly for it!' I exclaimed, as I slunk along the sidewalk to the corner, keeping in the shadow all the way, and when I stood beside the box and saw by the light of the lamp, close by, that the ham was there, wrapped in something which looked like a handkerchief, I bit my lips and clenched my hands with rage. Had it been a common thief I should not so much have minded; but a policeman! it was more than I could stand. So I crouched myself in a doorway and waited. The watch were relieved at twelve o'clock; I knew that, and knew also that this would be the time when my policeman would come to take the ham from out of its hiding-place. And sure enough, when the time came, I heard him challenge the man who was to take his place and come marching down toward the corner. I let him get the ham under his arm before I stirred, but then I pounced on him like a tiger.

"'I've got you!' I cried. 'A pretty policeman you are, indeed; but you shall suffer for it; you shall suffer for it, I can tell you.'

"He struggled with me for a moment like a wild thing, and then all of a sudden dropped the ham and fell down in a helpless sort of a heap upon the ground.

"'I'm a ruined man!' he groaned, 'a ruined man! there's no hope for me now. Oh my God! my wife—my poor little wife!' and he burst out crying like a woman.

"The sight softened me, but I was angry still.

"'You should have thought of that before you become a thief,' I said. 'If the guardian of a man's property is not to be trusted, what is to become of him? And you look like a gentleman—you do not seem like a scoundrel; how have you ever stooped to do such a disgraceful thing as this?'

"He was standing beside me now, and the lamp fell upon his face. It was white as any corpse's, and his eyes glittered terribly.

"'I'll tell you what made me do it,' he said; 'it was the only thing which could have driven me to an act like that; my wife and child are starving—starving, I tell you, and I have nothing for them!'

"'Policemen's families don't often starve,' I said, with a sneer.

"'My God! can't you believe me—won't you believe me?' panted the man. 'I have only been appointed three days; I have not received a cent of salary yet. I have been ill a long while, and had neither money nor credit. Last night we went to bed supperless; to-day there has not been a crust in the house, and those hams tempted me, and I meant to pay you afterwards.'

"He covered his face with his hands, and I could see great tears dripping through his fingers, and before I knew it my own cheeks were moist, and so we stood silent with the ham lying between us on the ground.

"At last he turned towards me and said: 'Do what you like with me. The last hope is gone.'

"But I put my hand on his arm, and said: 'God forbid that I should take that last hope from you, that I, of all men, should be the one to ruin you. If your story is true—and I believe it is—I pity you more than I blame you.'

"He looked at me in a sort of bewildered way, as though he scarcely understood me, and I took him by the arm and led him back to the shop. There I filled a basket with bread and butter, and coffee, and put the ham on top of all. 'Take it home to your wife,' I said, 'you'll pay me when you get your salary, and if you are in need before that time, come to me. I'm a poor man myself, and I can feel for other poor men.'

"I shall never forget that man's face in all my life, so wondering, so thankful, and so awe-stricken. All he said was: 'God bless you," but there was a whole sermon in those three words, and I slept better for them.

"On Christmas night he paid me every cent, and from that day until I left the neighborhood dealt with me regularly. But times grew so much better that I took a store in a good street at the other end of the town, and, one way and another, saw no more of my policeman for three good years.

"One night, just such a cold night as that on which I first saw him staring at the hams, I was awakened long after midnight by a cry of fire. I started up to see the flames through the floor, and to know the store down stairs was all ablaze. The stairs were on fire also, and when I opened the entry door the hot air and smoke rushed in and almost smothered me, I gave up all hope of getting my wife and helpless little ones out of that burning building alive and safe. Help came to us, however, and, though in clambering down the ladder, I slipped and broke my arm, I was thankful when I saw that all were safe. I was so faint and ill from the accident, you see, that I hadn't all my wits about me, and believed there was no one missing. My blood ran cold when my wife, clasping her hands, with an awful look upon her face, screamed:

"She had slept with our hired girl since her baby brother was born, and the woman in her fright had forgotten her little one. There she was at the top of that burning building, out of the reach of any human help; it seemed to me, as I looked up at the walls, a great, red and yellow sheet of flame, with blue gleams here and there, as though the devilish heads were peeping out and grinning at us. Still, hopeless as it was, I should have gone back into the burning house and saved my baby or died with her if I had been able to stand. No one else would venture. It would be a foolish sacrifice of life, they said, for no doubt the child was already smothered by the smoke, and though I raved and pleaded, and made wild promises, they shook their heads, and only bade me have patience.

"Patience!" I thought that I was going mad as the face of my little girl—my sweet, pretty pet—rose up before me. But just then a tall man dashed through the crowd and came toward me.

"'Quick!' he shouted, 'which room is the child in—speak quickly—which room?'

"'The back room on the upper floor,' I groaned, and he dashed away from me, parting the throng with his strong arms, and in another moment I saw him mounting the ladder. I heard them calling him to come back, bidding him beware, and speaking of him as though he were dead, already. But he never heeded them, and as I saw him hidden by the black smoke which poured from the window, I covered my face and prayed that the angels who walked in the fiery furnace might go with him.

"Perhaps they did. Something stronger than an earthly thing must have been there, for in a few minutes—they seemed years to me then—we saw him coming down the ladder with something in his arms. 'The burnt body of my child, perhaps,' I thought, but as he came closer, I saw that it was my own laughing, living darling, with her blue eyes open and little arms about his neck.

"The roof fell in the next moment, but my treasure was safe and that was all I cared for.

"'What shall I say or do to thank you,' I said, as I grasped his hand. 'I'm a ruined man, and I can only give you my blessing; but let me know your name at least.'

"'Have you forgotten me? don't you remember me?' he said, as he bent over me. 'Look again.'

"I did, and I saw a pair of bright gray eyes, a face I knew, and something glittering on his breast. And the scene at the corner of the dirty little street, on a wet December night, came back to me, and I saw my policeman once more.

"'It is you,' I said, 'and you have saved my child from such an awful death."

"'And what did you save me and mine from?" he said, with tears in his eyes.—'Starvation, ruin, utter degradation. I should have been a felon, and my dear ones paupers this night, but for you. I have not paid the debt; I never can; but when I heard that it was your child that lay at the top of that burning building, I prayed that I might save it, and I know God heard me.'

"And then he told me what had brought him to the neighborhood on that night of all others in the year.

"I had lost all, for I was not insured, but he was prosperous and stood by me like a brother; nursed me through my illness, and loaned me money for a new start in life. So that in a little while things grew bright again, and here I am, you see, as comfortable as most people."

"And the policeman?" I asked.

"His hair is as white as my own now," said the old man. "And my daughter, the little one he saved that night, is married to his son."

FAT MEN.—Our corpulent readers will not object if we say a few words in their favor. It is said to be a fact that no fat man was ever convicted of murder. Stout people are not revengeful, nor as a general rule, are they agitated by violent gusts of passion. To parade a fat housebreaker in the criminal dock at the Quarter Sessions would be a phenomenon indeed. The fellow who works with skeleton keys is generally a lean and wiry individual, as he can only force himself through holes scarcely large enough to admit a cat. Imagine a fat man doing these things, and then imagine him alarmed and running away, with a policeman after him. Corpulency is not the sign of villainy, but rather of good nature and good will to all men.

IF a man could be conscious of all that is said of him in his absence, he would probably become a very modest man indeed.

UNREQUITED.

THE words that trembled on your lips
Were uttered not—I knew it well!
The tears that would your eyes eclipse
Were checked and smothered ere they fell;
The looks and smiles I gained from you
Were little more than others won. . . .
And yet you are not wholly true,
Nor wholly just what you have done.

You know—at least you might have known—
That every little grace you gave,
Your voice's somewhat lowered tone,
Your hand's first shake or parting wave,
Your every sympathetic look
At words that chanced your soul to touch
While reading from some favorite book—
Was much to me—alas! how much!

You might have seen—perhaps you saw—
How all of these were steps of hope
On which I rose, in joy and awe,
Up to my passion's lofty scope:
How, after each, a firmer tread
I planted on the slippery ground,
And higher raised my venturous head
And ever new assurance found.

May be, without a further thought,
It only pleased you thus to please;
And so to kindly feelings wrought
You measured not the sweet degrees:—
Yet, though you hardly understood
Where I was following at your call,
You might—I dare to say you should!—
Have thought, how far I had to fall.

And thus when, fallen, faint, and bruised,
I see another's glad success,
I may have wrongfully accused
Your heart of vulgar fickleness:—
But even now, in calm review
Of all I lost and all I won,
I cannot deem you wholly true,
Nor wholly just what you have done.

RICHARD MONCKTON MILNES.

ITALIAN BRIGANDAGE.

Brigandage still continues to be the opprobrium of some of the fairest regions of Italy. The permanence of this inveterate evil is one of the most remarkable of the moral phenomena which the history of Italy presents. All the measures that have hitherto been taken for its eradication have more or less failed, and it really seems as if the practice had in the course of ages completely wrought itself into the character and habits of a portion of the people; for the province in which brigandage still chiefly prevails is the one in which it has existed from the earliest times. It is nearly co-extensive with the ancient Samnium, some of the mountain tribes of which had given themselves up from time immemorial to a predatory life. They had amassed considerable wealth when they first came in contact with the Romans. Their arms were highly finished and costly, and, according to Cæsar, supplied models for those of the Roman troops. Neither time nor the surrounding civilization has effected much change in the habits and character of this people. The bandit is here still a popular hero. The tradition and tales of his exploits pass from generation to generation, and are equally the delight of childhood, youth, and age. A traveller, attracted by curiosity to these savage regions, and struck with the surpassing beauty of some village belle, would probably be told, in a confidential whisper, that the girl who could have commanded the hand of the wealthiest peasant in the district, is betrothed to the noble brigand chief whose home is among the distant hills. There are, however, two distinct descriptions of brigandage, —one normal, the other accidental. The professional brigand is often the father of a family, cultivating his paternal fields in the intervals of his lawless occupation, proud of his ancestral honors, and not without a certain sense of religion; for, kneeling before the humble picture of the Virgin, which imparts, as he believes, a sanctity as well as a grace to his cavern, he invokes her blessing, and proceeds, in the full confidence of her favor, on his adventure of rapine and blood. In some districts the lower orders sympathize with brigandage and support it; and the better classes are coerced by a system of terrorism into complicity. Military measures may have checked, but they have been ineffectual to suppress it A condition of society in which almost the whole population are banded together in a league against government and law. is a phenomenon produced by the combination of many causes, Much is attributable to the long impoverished condition of the peasantry, and to their social isolation. "Neapolitan brigandage," says Count Maffei, whose former official connection with the province enables him to speak with authority on the subject, "is only the symptom of the decay that for centuries has been constantly undermining that unhappy country. The peasant there has no interest to bind him to the soil, and even the persons whom we call proprietors are far from being owners of the land. In those districts there is a part of the population designated by the name of terrazzani, who have actually nothing to live upon but the proceeds of plunder and theft. The misery and destitution of these classes are the direct causes of brigandage. When the poor laborer compares the brigand's life with his own wretched lot, he cannot avoid drawing conclusions far from favorable to the cause of law and order; and we cannot wonder that that romantic existence lures him from the constant labor and misery to which, in his own station, he is hopelessly condemned. The voice of conscience is silenced, and he betakes himself to a course of life which appears to him a legitimate way of obtaining his livelihood."

Such has been for centuries the social state of the country, and multitudes of the poor resorted to brigandage almost as if it were an honorable and lucrative calling; a statement which is confirmed by the fact, that of 375 brigands in the gaols of the province of La Capitanata in the month of April. 1862, 293 were laborers (praccianti); while in those districts where the laborers and proprietors stood in a more satisfactory relation to each other, brigandage attracted only a few of the worst characters, and was easily put down. In the districts on the borders of the Papal States, where it is a foreign importation, bands of brigands are organized without difficulty. Sheltering themselves on the Roman side of the frontier, they make irruptions into the Italian territory, emboldened by the certainty that, at the approach of danger, there is always a safe retreat in their rear.

The country recently infested by political brigandage has been not the Abruzzi nor Calabria, but a district about fifty miles to the east of Naples, and the line of frontier bordering upon the Papal States, between Sora and Terracina. The contest with brigandage has been harassing and obstinate, and has proved one of the greatest impediments to the progress of Southern Italy; "but," as Count Maffei justly says, "if brigandage had no support but its own strength, a fourth of the troops which have been contending with it would have been sufficient to put it down."

The losses sustained between the years 1860 and 1864 by the brigand hordes which have kept the Neapolitan provinces in a state of chronic anarchy. show that the work of extermination is not being efficiently performed:

Brigands shot [executed]	1038
Killed in conflict with the troops	2413
Total killed	3451
Taken prisoners	2768
Total	6219

In the same period 932 brigands voluntarily surrendered. A story is related by Count Maffei which shows that there exists a certain sense of honor even among these outlaws. The general officer in command of the military division of Avellino came suddenly upon a party of fourteen brigands. Surprised and surrounded, they requested permission to attend a mass at the nearest church before they surrendered, stipulating only for their lives. As Christmas was at hand, they asked permission after mass to spend that holiday with their friends, pledging themselves to return on a stated day. The officer, curious to ascertain whether the word of a brigand could be trusted, granted their request, and, to his surprise, all returned at the time appointed, but accompanied by eleven more brigands, who voluntarily surrendered. Touched by their honesty, the officer desired them to go home again until the first day of the new year, and to return on the second. They all reappeared, but with twenty additional brigands, who also gave themselves up. This proves that conciliation may not be without its advantages. We should be glad to hear that each commune had been made responsible for the acts committed within its bounds.

A Commission was appointed by the Italian Government in 1861 to inquire into the best means for removing from the country the disgrace of brigandage. The recommendations of the Commission include the diffusion of education, the extinction of certain feudal privileges which have been found to operate unfavorably on the condition of the peasant. the drainage of marsh lands, the encouragement of public works, and, above all, the construction of roads. No country in Europe, not even excepting Spain, is so ill provided with roads as Italy. The Government of ancient Rome constructed great military ways, and made a few roads for the convenience of the luxurious patricians leading to fashionable watering places, such as Baiæ and Naples; but the country south of the capital was inhabited chiefly by shepherds, and roads were therefore scarcely required. La Basilicata, a province nearly equal in extent to the whole of Tuscany, is to the present day almost entirely without carriage roads. The inhabitants of such a country must necessarily be unable to hold much intercourse even with such small centres of civilization as exist, and commerce must be almost unknown. The immense tract which separates the Abruzzi from La Capitanata is equally destitute of roads. Beneventum, situated in a cul de sac, has only that leading towards Rome and Naples. In the province of the Neapolitan capital itself twenty-four communes are totally unprovided with roads; and of the whole 1848 communes of the former Neapolitan kingdom, there were, in 1860, 1321 entirely without carriage ways.

Something has already been done by the Italian Government to supply a want so indispensable to the progress of the country. Military roads have been cut through the peninsula of Monte Gargano, and it is consequently no longer infested by banditti. But the moral remedies for the plague of brigandage,—the sad inheritance from long ages of misgovernment and neglect—remain in a great degree to be applied.—London Saturday Review.

LIVE WIVES AND DEAD HUSBANDS.

THERE'S John, reading his newspapers. You might drive nails into his temples, and he wouldn't know it. Look at him!—legs up, head thrown back, and a cigar in his mouth—the very picture of absorbed enjoyment. Three papers he has there; he will read them all, till he has gleaned every particle of news. One good hour he has been at it. Now if I say to him, "John, what is the news?" he will reply "Oh, none—nothing in particular. There are the papers —take 'em if you like."

Now nobody in his senses believes that John has been employed one good hour reading "nothing." He is just too lazy to tell what he has read—that's the amount of it. Now I would much rather read those papers than mend this coat of his. It is really too bad of John; he might have given me something to think about while I was doing it. An idea! Suppose I try this lazy system on him. Now if there's anything men like when their wives come home with a budget of news, it is to have them sit down and entertain them with it —not about troubles or servants, of course, but spicy little bits of gossip about their friend Jones' wife, and what the witty Mrs. Brown said on such an occasion, and how the pretty and saucy Miss —— said if she were Smith's wife she would ——. Oh, don't they like to hear all about it! and don't they like to question them as to how women think and feel on such and such subjects, which information they can only obtain from their wives. Of course they do; and when a bright little woman has chatted to them an hour or more, and told them more amusing things than you could count, and they have laughed and enjoyed it, what return do they make? Why, they just stretch themselves on the sofa and go to sleep.

Now I tell you what—I for one have borne this state of things long enough!' It is all owing to that vile lethargic tobacco. Before long we women will be expected to cut up their food, and feed them; they will be too lazy even to eat. Now I'll tell you what I mean to do—I am going to cut off the supplies till I get something back. I'll just try the monosyllabic system on John. He will say to-night, "Well, Mary, where have you been to-day? and what have you seen?" and I'll just answer, bending over my work, "Oh, I went out a little, and I didn't see anything in particular. Then John will take a scrutinizing look at me, and ask if I have the headache; and I shall answer sweetly, "No, dear." Then John will try again: "Well, Mary, did you go shopping?" "I? no—oh no, dear. I didn't go shopping to-day." Another look at me, and another period of reflection. "Have you heard any bad news, Mary?"—"No, John, I hope not. "Well—what then makes you so silent? You generally have so much to tell me, and you sometimes get off a very bright thing, if you did but know it. Something is the matter with you—what is it?" and John will come round and peep into my face. "Oh, pshaw! I know—you are paying me off for not talking," he will say, half-vexed, half-repentant.

Then I shall get up in the middle of the room, and hold forth. "Yes, John—that's just it. You haven't the ghost of an idea how horridly stupid you've grown! Don't I hate that lethargic tobacco! It is going to revolutionize society, let me tell you. We women are squirrel-like creatures, and can't stand it. No wonder all these awful trials fill the papers. You needn't laugh. I tell you it takes two to make home bright. Don't you suppose, you lazy thing, that a woman is as much perplexed, and worried, and sick of the practical at the end of the day as a man can be? Do you suppose she always feels like giving out the last remnant of her vitality to amuse a statue? I tell you she wants a response; and she would have it too, if a man's soul and body were not so tobacco-steeped that every sense and feeling is merged in the one drowsy desire to let the world and everything in it, including its wives, go to the dogs. And they are going, John! Now, lastly, I tell you-and all other Johns who may read this, that it is the very worst possible policy on your part, as you'd see if you ever read the papers with an eye to your own firesides, which you don't. You can wonder how Smith's wife or how Jones' wife could ever have done so-and so; but it never enters your slow heads to ask if the homes of these wives were silent and cheerless, and if their husbands took all their attempts to enliven them as matters of course, and gave no echo back; and that being the case. whether the bright sunbeams outside might not glitter too temptingly for their weariness."

And here I shall jump down from the chair, and, looking at John, shall see—that he is fast asleep! FANNY FERN.

'THE rule about rivers dividing kingdoms does not hold in Europe. The Danube, for example, flows through two kingdoms and two empires. It begins as a Protestant rivulet, becomes a Roman Catholic, and finally turns Turk.

"BLACK SHEEP."

"Black Sheep," a new story by Edmund Yates, now publishing in Charles Dickens' Magazine, is commenced in the present number of The Californian. Edmund Yates is the author of "Land at Last," and other popular novels, and the fact that Charles Dickens has chosen him out of the entire field of popular English writers to furnish the leading serial for his magazine, All the Year Round, is alone a sufficient guarantee of his superiorty as a writer, and an undeniable voucher for the ability and quality of the story.

CHARLES ALGERNON SWINBURNE.

MR. SWINBURNE'S new volume confirms the opinion that in subtle skill in the use of language for producing effects similar to those produced by the arts that appeal to the sight, and in mastery of the mere music of verse, he is the greatest of English poets. The movement and rhythm of some of his anapæstic verses, altogether aside from the sense, are sometimes as ravishing as a delicious strain of music on the water of a midsummer night, and sometimes as wild and stiring as a bugle note. In making words and phrases do the work of colors he surpasses Shelley himself, and it is impossible to say anything stronger than this. Nevertheless, to a certain extent, he is "a word-cobbler," resorting to artifices to charm the ear, that often seem like mere tricks. He has, in particular, a certain art of employing alliteration and the repetition of the words, which no other English poet has ever possessed, or at any rate, which none has ever employed with such amazing effect. True, this is an art which neither Milton nor Wordsworth would have used, had they possessed the secret of it, and perhaps it is an artifice rather than an art, but that it ravishes the ear, and excites vague pleasurable emotions like those produced by certain kinds of music, is undeniable. The anapæst is a wonderful power in his hands, and he seems fully conscious of the fact, for it is his favorite foot. Of course, in estimating a poet of Mr. Swinburne's grade, and in estimating him as an artist, we have nothing to do with the supposed "moral tendencies," etc., of his poems. No really great artist ever worked to embody a moral, for every great artist feels if he does not know, that whatever is true and genuine of its kind carries its moral with it, and that memorable things in art cannot be achieved in the spirit in which edifying stories for good little boys are written. Therefore we are not going to lecture the poet on the score of his wickedness, sensuality and paganism. We would indeed have wished that his subjects had been different, and his manner of treating them different. We would have wished that his taste should turn less steadily in the direction of scoffing, libidinous, and atheistic song. But Mr. Swinburne is Mr. Swinburne, not Milton or Wordsworth. He must see through his own eyes, and speak of what he sees according to the depth of his own vision. Life and humanity and the universe are many-sided, and we are willing to see Mr. Swinburne's side; and though we cannot conscientiously recommend his new volume as a Sunday school book, we are not blind to its beauty and power. Finally, we are very far, indeed, from considering Mr. Swinburne a great poet in the larger and worthier sense. His vision is intensely keen, but narrow in its range. His mastery is in language rather than in thought. He could not endure the test of translation. Unless he could find a translator who possessed his own marvellous mastery of words and phrases, and tricks of rhythm and alliterative effects, all the bewildering charm and witchery and ravishment of his verse would evaporate and vanish in the process of the transfer into another language. His poetry is hot and feverish and lurid, and notwithstanding its marvellous power in certain directions it has no thoughtful depth, no contemplative wisdom, no serene and lofty beauty. He is blind to the nobler and sweeter aspects of life and humanity. With all his wealth of imagination, his splendor of phrase, his magical mastery of language and rhythm, he is absolutely poverty-stricken, in those loftier and more enduring elements that make the highest species of poetry a thing of beauty and a joy forever. On another page, the reader will find some excerpts from his last volume, from which he can judge for himself of the justice of our estimate of this the most brilliant and idiosyncratic poet of our generation.

THE TASTE OF OUR MEN OF WEALTH.

THOUGH there is much truth in the indictment against San Francisco Artists drawn by a correspondent, and which will be found on another page of our present issue, there are some of the counts, upon which we should be inclined to render a verdict of Not Guilty.

Our correspondent's picture of the existing state of things among us in reference to high art, is painfully accurate. There is little pure taste or genuine appreciation, except among classes that do not possess the means of affording substantial encouragement to genius. Unfortunately the great majority of those who are pecuniarily qualified to play the part of Mecænas, are destitute of every other qualification. If they buy books or pictures at all, they buy them as furniture, or because they consider it fashionable. But they do not really care for them or enjoy them, or believe in them. Neither as a general thing have they much faith in the sincerity of people who do profess to care about such things; they can understand how a man can be thoroughly in earnest in his admiration of a thousand dollar mirror, or of gorgeous upholstery, how he can grow enthusiastic over a choice pate, a particularly a fine cigar, or the latest fashionable brand of champagne; but that a sensible human being should derive much real and unfeigned pleasure from a picture or a poem, they can neither comprehend nor fully credit. In addition to the more blunt and manly class of wealthy materialists who do not disguise their contempt for "art nonsense," and who are in fact rather proud of it, it is not pleasant to consider how large a proportion of those who seem to take an interest in these matters, and who even go into raptures over what it is fashionable to admire, are either insincere or unintelligent in their admiration. A taste for music is more easily cultivated than a taste for either of the sister arts, and yet how large a share of the professed enjoyment of the higher order of music, is probably a mere affectation.

Our correspondent attributes this condition of things to the lack of "artists of great ability," whose works would be of so high a grade as to "educate the taste of the community." He thinks our wealthy men have "few or no opportunities to learn, if ignorant, what is really good." Now this appears to us to be taking up the difficulty at the wrong end, and confounding cause with effect. The cultivation of pure taste in the patrons of art, and of talent and genius in the artist, must advance together. All appreciation commences on a comparatively low plaine, and works upward gradually. The person who begins by honestly and unaffectedly admiring a sign-painter's daub, or the rudest ballad that ever jingled, may come in time to appreciate Turner or Tennyson. It is the Gallio who "careth for none of these things," whose case is hopeless, caused by art-objects no matter how little calculated those objects may be to satisfy a highly cultivated taste. If our wealthy citizens will only learn to interest themselves in art at all, they will soon learn to appreciate and admire what is genuine and worthy of admiration, more than the charlatan productions which are "made to sell." The importation of "great artists" is not what is needed. Let a taste for high art begin to develop itself, and the supply of a superior article will soon equal the demand for it. The genius and the capacity are here. What is really required is the taste that will appreciate, call for, and adequately reward the best and worthiest efforts of that genius and capacity.

We are indebted to Choyinski, of the Antiqnarian Bookstore on Second street, for a choice assortment of foreign and Eastern periodicals. Choyinski is the chief literary purveyor for the whole of that portion of the city south of Market street, and his "Circulating Library" includes all the more interesting new publications.

New Music.—"Truth in Absence," a new song, made popular by Miss Emma Howson, has just been published by M. Gray.

IDEALISTS IN POLITICS.

SO far as abstract questions are concerned there can be no compromise between right and wrong. But what is inadmissible in philosophy, or in theoretical ethics, is often not only necessary, but wise in practical affairs. So far as theory is concerned, we can accept nothing that falls short of the standard of ideal perfection; but in practice we must be content temporarily at least, with what is attainable. And the difference between the philosopher and the statesman commences precisely here; the former deals with theories and principles, the latter with measures. Expediency and the friction of present circumstance and surrounding, which are not admitted as elements into the calculations of the one, have a powerful influence with the other. In politics, there can be no real issue in regard to principles—at least no practical issue. This only arises when the abstract ideas and ethical or philosophical theories of hostile parties have been reduced to the shape of measures. Votes cannot be taken, or political campaigns conducted upon abstract issues. The question as between the theories of Reconstruction held by President Johnson and Congress respectively could never be practically settled so long as they retained a purely theoretical form. But when Congress embodied their ideas on the subject in a bill, a real political issue was presented.

Simple as these propositions may appear, it is from a lack of the perception of their truth that much of the acrimony and violence of our political warfare springs. The practical men who wish to do the best that the nature of the case will admit, misunderstand the theorists whom they denounce as visionaries, radicals and abstractionists; while the latter in their turn accuse the others of sacrificing principle to expediency. It is seldom that the philosopher is fit for the work of the statesman; indeed, it is rarely the case that either order of mind can comprehend and do justice to the other.

LOCAL ART ITEMS.

IT cannot be said that San Francisco is illiberal in her patronage of artists. Thomas Hill, by a few years of labor on these shores has accumulated quite a snug little sum, and gone East to enjoy a brief period of leisure. We believe it is his intention to visit the French Exhibition of 1867.

Butman, also, is in the Eastern States, having retired for awhile to live upon the, by no means, moderate earnings of his pencil. Both of these artists have paintings on exhibition at Jones & Wooll's; the View of the Yo-Semite, by Hill, being one of the best of his works. At the same place is exhibited a new picture, by Nahl. The subject is a young native California Girl, standing at the door of a vine-clad cottage. Within is seen the dim figure of an old crone bending over a fire and preparing a meal. In the foreground are painted with wonderful exactness such household implements as one might see at every other kitchen door in the country. The picture presents very clever effects of natural and artificial light, but as a work of art, is hardly one the artist should be willing to risk his reputation upon.

Wandersforde has, at Roos' gallery, a view, in oil, of Clear Lake. The tone of this picture is excellent—the finish very perfect. Mr. Wandersforde has seldom exhibited oil paintings, but we have seen few, if any, executed by resident artists, possessing one tithe of the merit of this. We were shown at this gallery three water colors, two of them compositions, the third a view in the Yo-Semite Valley, by one whose name, in art circles, is almost unknown. They are from the pencil of William Keith, a young fellow townsman, and a beginner and student in art. These pictures are but studies, and are the first he has exhibited, but they show a promise of genius of the highest order. There is a vigor and freedom of style, truthfulness in effect, and brilliancy of coloring that no artist on these shores has yet equalled.

Bush shows two small pictures which betoken a commendable improvement in style.

Arriola, who paints with almost the rapidity of a Hoe printing press, has also at the same place, quite a number of pieces, remarkable only for the singular infelicity displayed in the choice of subjects, the atrocity of their coloring and the pertinacity with which they are displayed to the view of a bewildered public.

Denny, our only marine artist, seems to be idle, for we have seen nothing from his hand for a long time. Astræa.

California Dress Silk.—Messrs. Newman & Meyer, silk manufacturers of this city, completed, on Thursday last, their first dress pattern, and gave it a public exhibition at their manufactory, corner of Battery and Jackson streets. It was a very heavy fabric of black silk, soft and glossy, thirty-eight inches in width and twelve yards long. It was woven from raw silk imported from China. The raw material can be imported free, while the manufactured silk has to pay sixty per cent. duty. China and Japan now supply a large portion of the looms of Italy and France with raw silk, which can be laid down in California at very low rates, and can be profitably converted into dress goods under the present protective tariff.

Nosopoetic.

THE above is the pretty term which Dr. Rowell used in his lecture on swill-milk, which he delivered before the Dashaways. He used it because it was an uncommon word, and those of his audience who were unacquainted with the Greek language would not be able to guess at its meaning. Some persons thought when he called this milk "nosopoetic" that he referred to its smell. Most people thought it had something to do with a nose. Its use made the lecture sound learned. Had he used the word "noso-comical," many would have thought he was speaking of a snub nose—while, perhaps, nosopoetic might mean the poetic or Grecian nose. The housekeepers of San Francisco should be grateful to Dr. Rowell for teaching them this word. Let them try it on the milkman. What a stunning effect it would have on a milkman to say, "Wretched man you are discovered! Your milk is nosopoetic! Nosography has taught me that my blessed infant is murdered by you, and the nosocomical professors confirm my view of the case."

As there are many persons who will not take the trouble to search for the meaning of a word which they do not understand, perhaps they will be able to remember why swill-milk is called nosopoetic if we help them by putting it into rhyme, like the statement of the number of days in each month in the year:

Milk nosopoetic
Makes all the babies sick—
Gives them the stomach ache,
Keeps them all night awake;
Produces diseases.
And, while it appeases
The poor infant's craving
For food, sends it raving
Drunk quite, and it cries on,
Cause why? It's took pison!
Milk nosopoetic
All rules dietetic
Forbid to a babby—
It makes it grow flabby;
It never can nourish—
The babby won't flourish.
Of course all fond mothers
This very much bothers;
They know that a cow will
Drink swill—so says Rowell.
"Give 'Johnny' or 'Mary'"
No milk from a dairy;
Get a cow to supply it—
Just rent one or buy it.

MORAL.

Now, mothers, advice take. At once buy a cow—
Don't hesitate, doubting and wondering how
You'll feed it, and if you can make the spec pay,
The milkman finds "Where there's swill there's a way."

Mrs. Woxcackle on St. James' and the Jesuits.

MR. EDDYTER: Sir—I was indooced by some frends to take an interest in the St. James' Fair for the benefit of the Free pew Church now worshipping at Dashaway Hall; and accordingly, being a churchwoman, and as such opposed to dissent and conventercles, and meeting houses, and believing that there is no "church without a bishop," and that Dr. Wadsworth, and Dr. Scudder, and Dr. Stone; and Dr. Stebbins, and the rest of them dissenters have no more right to administer the sacrements than a chimbley sweep, not having the apostolical succession nor the three orders, I thought I was doing a Christian work in making up sofa cushions and afghans, and tidies, and such for the Fair; and mercy knows I spent money enough at Locan's for worsters and patterns, to keep a poor family in vittals for a month, and now after all, the Fair is a failure, the rumor being spread, which I regard as a wicked slander, that Mr. Eagan is a wolf in sheep's clothing, and a disgnised Jesuit, and means to carry the church over to the Rouin Catholicks, for which he was sent over here from Rome by the Pope, and which I am sure Mr. Eagan never dreamed of, though I for one am sorry that he did give in about the beautiful uniform and the red vestures he appeared in, which the Bishop disapproved of, being nufortunately low church, wich I mean the Bishop, not Mr. E.

As to the Fair, I lost all interest in it when I saw it was being badgerized to that extent; and so, not being disposed to be dictated to and domineered over by offishus upstarts and new people that come from no one knows where, and who don't know who was their own grandmothers, I withdrew and retired, not wishing to have nothing more to do with it. Yonrs Respectful,

MARIA WOXCACKLE.

P. S. There are some religious people who are very fond of "doing good," as they call it, by which they mean taking the lead and making themselves conspickuus in everything that is going on in the church; hut they don't think that there is ennything good or Christian, unless they can he offishus and have the management, which I despise and abominate. If its on the strength of their rich husbands that they presoom, (which Mr. Woxcackle can buy and sell most of 'em) it certainly isn't because they contribute more than others, which is fur from the truth. Doing good indeed! But they shan't dictate to me, that I'm determined. M. W.

P. P. S. Last night, which was Friday, Mr. Woxcockle and me looked in again to the Fair; Mr. Woxcackle saying he thought he might "make sometbing on his luck, in the raffels," and that it was "as good sport as going to Steve Whipple's," which is unbeknown to me what he meant. But sure enough he did turn out lucky, for his number drawed a prize in Mrs. ——'s raffel. I must also in common cander take back what I said about the Fair being a failure, for the hall was full, which was owing to the Queen of the Sandwich Islands being advertised to be present, which was brought about in consequence of St. James' being a High Church, like Bishop Staley's of which Queen Emma is a dootiful member and communicant. All of which gave a hily aristocratic tone to the Fair last night. M. W.

Advice to Young People.

We are always charmed to meet with those paragraphs in newspapers which are headed "Advice to Young People." One of these has again started on its travels round the press, and is doing, no doubt, an immensity of good. We transfer a few of these moral maxims to this column in order—as "Mark Twain" advises—to give a moral tone to the "Lion's Mouth:"

"Keep your own secrets, if you have any. When you speak to a person look him in the face."

We think it would be better, perhaps, to advise a young person to keep another person's secret and please himself about keeping his own. The second piece of advice is of course intended for young people who don't squint. The author of this edition of advice to young people is evidently one of the Legion—not that which choked the pigs, but the Temperance Legion—for he says "Drink no kind of intoxicating liquor." We should, in favor of good little boys who have their healths drunk on their birthdays, except raspberry wine which is an intoxicating liquor, though not severely so. Here is a piece of advice which is not very easy to follow:

"Ever live (misfortune excepted) within your income."

Of course a young person can, when he has an income, live "within" it; hut, in the case of misfortune, it appears he is not expected to live within his income—that is, he is to live without it.

"Make no haste to be rich if you would prosper."

That is shocking advice. It is a good thing to be rich, hut getting rich is not always an honorable or pleasant occupation—so the sooner it is done the better. This string of moral maxims closes with the advice "Read over the above maxims at least once a week." We suppose the author of these maxims thought himself a perfect apostle. We expect he was the author of "The Advantages of Early Rising" and other works designed to make people uncomfortable. It is quite a work of supererogation to write advice to young people as long as there exists a work entitled "The Proverbs of Solomon." If young men would read those maxims ever once every week, they might very often prevent them from making fools of themselves.

Babies are Beasts.

Gail Hamilton, in her volume entitled "Gala Days," makes the assertion that babies are beasts. Oh, mothers of America, arise in your wrath and annihilate this Herod in petticoats! Fancy a man deliberately putting in print such a statement as this: "Childhood is preeminently the animal stage of existence. The baby is a beast—a very soft, tender caressive beast—a beast full of promise—a beast with the germ of an angel—but a beast still."

It is all very fine for Gail Hamilton to try to tone down the severity of her remarks by saying that a baby is a nice little beast, a pretty little beast, and all that sort of thing, but it won't do. She, directly after this, commences abusing it again, saying: "It is not so amusing as a monkey," and a week-old baby is "a puling, scowling, wretched, dismal, desperate-looking animal." Isn't this awful? Everyone who has ever had a baby—that is every mother—knows that a baby—that is, her baby—is an angel and gets wickeder and wickeder every day after it is old enough to go to school. Babies are beasts, are they, Gail Hamilton? We should not like to test your philosophy by calling one of your babies a beast (Gail Hamilton is married and has children we believe); we value our precious eyesight too much. Isn t it a pleasant reflection that beasts are of the kingdom of Heaven? Have you never read your Bible Gail Hamilton? Brillat Savarin in his "Hand-book of Dining," philosophizes on the manner in which man, who was at first frugiverous because he was too weak to kill animals fit for food, was lead to invent weapons first to defend himself and "his carniverous instinct represented by his canine teeth also urged him and, once armed, he preyed and fed upon all animals round him." He then continues: "This instinct of destructiveness still exists; children seldom fail to kill the little animals that are left at their mercy; if they were hungry they would eat them"

Of course Gail Hamilton will approve of this, and will call babies "destructive, slaughterous, carniverous beasts." Mothers ought to know whether babies are beasts or not. Gail Hamilton is probably a mother, so we may be wrong If mothers will drop their ideas on this subject into the Lion's Mouth, we will see that they are properly masticated and digested; and if they prove that babies are not beasts, then shall the Lion's Mouth utter fearful roars in defense of outraged and calumniated babyhood.

Humane.

The Sacramento Union professes a vast deal of "humane feeling" toward the Alta, which it seems to imagine stands in extraordinary need of sympathy. Says the Sacramento organ: "We are disposed to humane and would gladly throw the Alta a line to help it out of the ugly pool in which the collapse of Johnsonism has left that journal floundering. The catastrophe is pitiable. It would be a genuine case for sympathy but that even in its struggles to reach a firm footing on the right side of the great question of the day the victim frantically denies the solidity of the ground on which we stand and casts muddy spray in the face of truth."

We suspect there's a lurking taint of hypocrisy in this pretended commiseration. What galls the "Radical" provincial organ, is the Alta's lofty moral announcement that it wasn't going to "do right in bad company," and though Andy Johnson and his policy were all O. K. it was going to sail into both "because they were supported by Copperheads." The country paper can't understand the Alta's high-toned code of ethics. That's what's the matter.

Mr. Jefferson Snort on the Architects of San Francisco.

Our fervid and rather excitable anti-Bostonian correspondent, Mr. Jefferson Snort, sends us a communication for the "Lion's Mouth" embodying a particularly ferocious onslaught upon the architects of this city, which we feel somewhat delicate about publishing until we have consulted our attorney as to the liability which we might incur by so doing under the provisions of the law of libel.

The following is the least violent portion of the epistle:

MR. EDITOR:—I am by profession an architect, a profession which I have practised for thirty years, in several of the principal cities of the Republic. But if I remain in San Francisco, I shall have to abandon it or forfeit all right to my own self-respect. The men who call themselves "architects" here, are for the most part empirics and charlatans; many of them are mere illiterate scrubs, destitute of the very rudiments of a professional education. * * * It is scarcely credible—it is monstrous, and yet it is the congelated truth, that men who were boss carpenters at home, and who couldn't tell a Corinthian from a Doric column, or furnish an answer to the query whether the Pantheon was a Gothic structure or not, have the effrontery to set up here for "architects!" * * * They have no esprit du corps and no decent respect for the honorable usages of their profession. * * They underbid one another, and practice the most despicable arts to obtain employment. Some of them even take work for nothing to bring themselves into notice. Nearly all are willing to "go into competion" on the quack principle of "no cure no pay." Let me instance: * * * In short, sir, I am disgusted. They are meaner and more grovelling than the pettifoggers of the Justice's Courts, more degraded than quack doctors, more jealous than rival singers or poets. They remind me of a nest of wriggling and hissing vipers, in which every viper is struggling to rear his head above the heads of his fellows. There are some exceptions, hut they are disgustingly few It makes me sick to think of it.

Yours indignantly, JEFFERSON SNORT.

All an Illusion.

The "heavy editor" of the Owyhee Avalanche has made the astounding discovery that "the sensation of shaking hands with a great man" is pretty much the same as that experienced in shaking hands with an ordinary mortal." He thus records his "experience:"

"Quite a number of men, of whom we've heard much and seen little, have visited our camp recently. In our rural simplicity, we always supposed that one would experience an unusual sensation when privileged to 'touch flesh'—shake hands—with the great; but it's all a delusion, else we're mistaken in the flesh we've touched; and this can hardly be, for among them are Judge Lowe of the Supreme Bench of Iowa; Messrs. Ladd and Tilton, Portland and New York bankers; Mr. Thompson, of the Oregon Steam Navigation Company; and Major-General Steele, Commanding Department of Columbia. We find all these gentlemen very agreeable people; like the most of us, looking out for their financial interests—except General Steele, who is interested in our red brethren and District Commander."

A Distinguished Member of Howard No. 3.

On Wednesday there was grief among the members of Howard Engine Company No. 3. Every man in the company felt that he had lost a friend. Death had stricken down one of their number, against whom no evil could be uttered. The friend whom they all mourned, was one who valued the friendship of the poorest of them as much as that of the rich, one who knew no deceit but was honesty and integrity itself. A member of the Company for fourteen years at the time when up to the hour of death, an active member still. Fanny died of old age and hard work in the Volunteer Fire Department at three minutes past 6 on Wednesday last. Fanny came of good family, being the daughter of a long line of settlers. Fourteen years ago Fanny, in consequence of some slight, no doubt, left her home, being at the time in an interesting condition. She entered the engine house of the Howards—mistaking it perhaps for a lying-in hospital—was hospitably received, and within a very short period of time after reaching this asylum became the mother of six interesting puppies. From that day up to the time of her death, Fanny has endeavored to pay the debt of gratitude which she felt was owing to the Howards. The faintest tap on a far distant bell, was immediately responded to by "3's dog." Fanny was always the first to hear the bell, and was never known to cease barking until the boys made preparations to run out the engine. We fear that had people whom good dogs bite, instinctively knowing that they deserve to be bitten, will not think that the fact of Fanny's having, since she took up her abode in the engine house, been the mother of ninety six dogs creditable to her. The Howards, however, always took good care of Fan at these times, and no delicacies were thought too good for the mother and her progeny. On Thursday night Fanny's body was enclosed in a burial case—not "a patent metalic" one—and placed on the hose carriage. Many mourners followed her remains to the grave at the corner of Mission and Spier streets. It is a pleasure to write an obituary notice of one concerning whom no harm can be said, and whom, as far as regards honesty and fidelity, not even a tombstone could flatter.

The "Times."

It is rumored that Mr. Craig, of the Eastern Associated Press, arrived in San Francisco by the last steamer, for the purpose of settling the difficulty about the Times obtaining the despatches. McClatchy says the Times is sure to get the despatches. McCrellish denies it. McCarthy says "we shall see." We say, let the "Macs" settle it among themselves.

Scene in a Segar Store.

Fast Young Man (Addicted to making puns)—Will you take a smoke, as the Pine street mill says to Montgomery street?

Montgomery Street Lounger—Don't care if I do. I'm used to it.

WE ARE compelled to observe that quite a number of our Atlantic literary exchanges are in the habit of republishing articles from THE CALIFORNIAN, without credit. What is still more in violation of the code of journalistic etiquette, they not unfrequently transfer poems and sketches written for THE CALIFORNIAN to their own columns as original contributions. Several of Emilie Lawson's poems, which first appeared in THE CALIFORNIAN, have been thus appropriated by the New York literary weeklies; and, in the last number of the Review, an excellent and high-toned journal, we find a poem by Charles Warren Stoddard, entitled "The Woodpecker," which was written for THE CALIFORNIAN and appeared in its columns about a year ago, republished with the line "For the N. Y. Weekly Review" over the title. We are quite confident from what we know of the character and standing of the Review, that there must be some satisfactory explanation of the matter, which will completely exonerate our contemporary from the suspicion of intentional wrong doing.

WEALTHY MINES.—The largest income tax paid in California is that returned by Jules Fricot of Nevada county; which is $181,511. His partners in mining, Messrs. Ripert and Pralus, return an income over $91,000 each. There are quite a number of others engaged in mining in the same county, whose incomes range between $40,000 and $100,000.

CONSCIENCE.

IT is an old and a trite saying, but not on that aecount tbe less correct, that a vast amount of the miscbief doue in the world is done by conscientious people. Writers, and more especially theological writers, have been in the habit of talking of conscience as if it were an unwritten Bible, a divinely appointed guide implanted by Providence in tbe heart of each individual to tell him what is right and what is wrong. The assumption that sucb an oracle exists within us is purely arbitrary; and if it be true tbat individual consciences have been the cause of many errors and of many erimes, it is merely an identical and self-evident proposition to maintain that conscience is not infallible. The admirable sermon in Tristram Shandy points ont how even St. Paul abstains from telling us that he has a good eonscience, and contents himself with saying that be trusts he has a good one, which is a diffcrent matter. And if bigotry, intolerance, and persecution are evils; if the many fanatical excesses that have disgraced evcry seetion of Christendom. our own included, are blots upon the annals of religion, it is evident that conscience itself is not always an unmixed blessing. A large part of Mr. Lecky's History of Rationalism might indeed, without impropriety, have been styled a history of the blunders of the human conscienee. For, like the oracle of Delphi, the oraeles of conscienee commit continually every conceivable mistake; they sanction what is evil, they condemn what is good, they are tortuous, partial, and obscure, and not seldom, when their influence is most required, they are dumb.

Most persons who think even superficially upon the subject will be forced to admit all this; but when it eomes to dealing with the ordinary affairs of life, we generally fall back upon our old allegiance to conscience, and wheuever we feel a disposition to be virtnous, we show it by obeying tbe minute whims and caprices of our "moraal instinct." Few preserve the golden means betweeu two opposite extremes. Either we neglect reason and the generous dictates of our hearts altogether, or we rush blindly into the other excess, and treat conscience like a wilful child, to be petted and humored at all hazards. How irrationally men and women may act while they are oecnpied in piously burning incense to this fictitious idol of their own creation, may be seen almost every hour of the day.

We need not go to history for instances of the fatuity of conscienee; we have plenty in our own drawing-rooms and at our own dinner-tables. One of the great difficulties in our intercourse with our fellow-creatures is to know when and where to draw a line. Naturc has no straight lines ready made; and in the same way it may be said that morality has no straight lines ready made; and there is no wide gulf, like that which separated Lazarus and Dives, to separate what is bad from what is good. The definition of virtue depends upon the circumstances through whose labyrinth it is the task of virtue to guide us with the golden thread, and, as the circumstances shift, tbe conception of wbat is best to be done under the circumstances must shift too. Accordingly, drawing lines is a nice and a continual occupation for anxious domestic moralists. If they employed reason upon the task, the results obtained would, at all events, be consistent and intelligible. But tbey employ in its stead that sort of vague moral sensibility to which they give the name of conscience, and the consequence is that they are usually landed in a maze of inconsistent absurdities.

If we could only unravel the history of any individual conscience, and see how it has grown to be what it is, our reverence for the name would not be increased. It is nothing better than a collective term applied to the sum total of moral sensibilities we possess, however, they may have been acquired, or on whatever foundation they may be based. The atmosphere, intellectual or religious, in which we have been brought up, the books we have read, the praise and blame we have seen distributed by others, the ideas we have admired in secret ourselves—all are represented in this single word. The force of association is nowhere exemplified more completely than in reference to our moral sentiments, and the manner in which they lay hold of our imagination. Every wave of human thought and experience, by means of oral or written education, finds its way, sooner or later, into conscience's cave. The delicate moral sense of a cultivated man or woman is a plant that has been fed by every sort of wind under heaven. Literature, society, imagination, books, men, dreams—all have gone into the mill, and helped to turn out our conscience as it is. A sense which is the product of such a weighty combination is not a sense to be unduly disparaged.

The advantage, on the other hand, of not closing one's eyes to the heterogeneous elements of which conscicnce is compounded, is that we learn to persurde ourselves thereby that one of the businesses of life is to weed aud reform conscience. The first thing that strikes one is the excessive difficulty of the operation. Most people so utterly depend, for whatever there is in them of good, upon their moral sensibility, that the business of prunning it appears as perilous as the Irishman's amusement of whittling away the signbdard on which he himself was seated. It is like snipping away at the rope by which we are suspended in mid-air. And there is something which seems like profanity in cutting down even prejudices which have become interwoven, in the course of time, with pious ideas or with generous emotions. Like the woodman's tree, they sheltered us in youth, and we do not feel inclined to desert them simply because argument for them is weak and wanting. Yet, the more sensitive and receptive a thing conscience is, the more it is capable of being formed and moulded by ourselves at our own will. Reason will make as good a centre for sentiment to grow round and to cling to as prejudice, and the sentiment thus planted is less likely to be torn up by the roots. The excuse so often put forward by a man, that he has acted according to his conscience, is not then an apology for a blunder or a folly. A man can make his own conscienee, just as he can raise his own watermelons. It is as much his duty to prevent it from becoming an inconvenient and tangled and matted growth of damp moral feeling as it is the business of a gardener to keep his fences clipped and to weed his gravel walks. It is true that men are to be judged according to their lights, but that is no reasou why they should not trim their lamps.

The principle on which each individual lamp may best be trimmed is not so easily defined. But the general history of human error, if it ever is written, will doubtless show that as fruitful a sonree of error in the past as any has been the self-assertion of Conscience over Law. Men take their wild growth of moral impressions and susceptibilities, however they may have been produced, and set them up in the plaee of maxims of universal application. The first thing, then, to be done to most eonsciences would be to see that their dictates are consonant with some code that will hold good for mankind at large. If not, conscience must be reformed till it speaks in a different toue. So to act as if each action were to be made the fonndation for a universal social law was Kant's golden rule; and one is never more likely to be impressed with its value than when one has been reflecting on the erratic variations of that untrustworthy compass, the human eonscience. The absurdity of intolerance, or bigotry, or prejudiced obstinacy, or even of those numerous and faneiful lines which eonscicnce in slighter matters draws, will become at once apparent if we endeavour for a moment to think of any of them as elevated to the position of an universal dogma.

California Wines.—The New York Home Journal has the following upon our wines: "The opening of the California wine region is most opportune. There, in the virgin soil and blander atmosphere of the sunny slopes of the Pacific, the vine flourishes in all its pristine health and vigor. It grows almost without human care, spreading its branches over the earth and bearing its rich loads of fruit year after year, scarcely failing once in a century. California is unmistakably one of nature's most carefully prepared wine-gardens. It is not surprising that these wines have become so popular in this country, and are taking the place of all others. To persons whose tastes have been perverted by the fiery, vitiated compounds which pass in the market for foreign wines, these pure California juices seem at first rather weak, and their delicate aromas and flavors fail of appreciation; but all natural, healthy tastes find in them the requisites of a perfect wine—a refined and delicious enjoyment of the palate: a genial nutriment which assimilates kindly with tbe blood, and a gentle stimulant which imparts a permanent tone and vigor to the system, without the injurious reaction of drugged and alcoholic mixtures. Such being their character, we cannot but rejoice to see them coming into general use, believing as we do that their introduction must tend powerfully to promote healtb and temperance."

Underground Travelling in London.—Underground travelling increases at a surprising rate. In the first six months of 1863, the number of passengers conveyed on the Metropolitan line was 4,823,437; in 1864, for the same period, it was 5,207,335; in 1865, it was 7,462,823; but in tbe first half of the present year it rose to 10,303,395. The revenue has correspondingly increased; in tbe first of the four periods it was £53,058; in the last, the sum amounted to £102.947, a prodigious sum to make up of sixpences, threepennies, and peuce. The overground traffic, however, along the same route remains much the same as it was before the Underground Railway was opened. The result is one of good augury for the other underground lines now in process of construction.

Interesting to Ladies.—Among tbe novel inventions of the day, is one by a down-Easter, who has patented a lady's garter, consisting of a soft, flexible band, which is to be clasped around a lady's leg, next to the skin, over which the stocking is to be drawn, and the usual elastic garter placed, so as to encircle the stocking directly over the band, and thus all uneasiness occasioned by the elastic binding the limb too tightly is obviated; besides this, the stocking is held up more securely and neatly.

The oldest house in the United States now standing as originally built, is the Rev. Dr. Whitfield's, at Guildford, Connecticut. It was built in 1639, and the stone walls and oakwork remain in good condition.

Chinese Literature.—The date of the invention of paper seems to prove tbat some of the most important arts connected with the progress of civilization are not extremely aucient in China. In the time of Confucius they wrote on the finely pared bark of the bamboo with a stile; they next used silk and linen, whieh explains why the character chy paper is eompounded of that for silk. It was not until A. D. 95 that paper was invented. The materials which they use in the manufacture are various. A coarse yellowish paper, used for wrapping parcels, is made from rice straw. The better kinds are composed of the liber, or inner bark of a species of morus, as well as of cotton, but principally of bamboo. As a reading people, the literature of China is, as may be expeeted, very abundant in quantity, if not super-excellent in quality. The main portion consists of plays, romances and novels. The general character of these indicates a powerful imagination, and a love of the grotesque; but the literary tone is low, and there is little, if any, moral purpose evinced in the developement of the plots. The historical literature is highly significant of the national character. There is a continuous history of China from the earliest ages down to the conclusion of the Mongol Tartar dynasty, called the "Twenty-one Historians," consisting of nearly three hundred of those brochures, or thin volumes stitched with silk, about ten of which are generally contained in a folding case. Yet we should search in vain in these volumes for anything beyond a barren chronicle of facts and dates. Trains of reasoning and lessons of political philosophy can scarcely be looked for in a country, the theory of whose government has always been despotic, however tempered by other circumstances. "Instead of allowing," observes Mr. Gutzlaff, very correctly, "that common mortals had any part in the affairs of the world, they speak only of the emperors who then reigned. They represent them as the source from which the whole order of things emanated, and all others as mere puppets, who moved at the pleasure of the autocrat. This is truly Chinese; the whole nation it represented by the emperor, and absorbed by him."

Education to be Adapted to the Individual.—The great secret of education is to develope the faculties of an individual; for it may happen that his real talents may lie hidden and buried under his education. A decided character, however, is repugnant to a particular pursuit, yet delighting in another; an indifferent lawyer might be an admirable architect. At present all our human bullion is sent to be melted down in a university, to come out, as if thrown into a burning mould, a bright physician, a bright lawyer, a bright divine; in other words, to adapt themselves for a profession, preconcerted by their parent. By this means we may secure a titular profession for our son; but the true genius of the avocation, the bent of the mind, as a man of great original powers called it, is too often absent. Instead of finding fit offices for fit men, we are perpetually discovering on the stage of society, actors out of character.

If a fellow attacked my opinions in print, would I reply? Not I. Do you think I don't understand what my friend, the Professor, long ago called the hydrostatic paradox of controversy? Don't I know what that means? Well, I'll tell you. You know that if you had a bent tube, one arm of which was the size of a pipe stem, and the other big enough to hold the ocean, water would stand the same height in one as the other. Controversy equalizes fools and wise men in the same way, and the fools know it.

Youthful Conduct.—The line of conduct chosen by a young man during the five years from fifteen to twenty will, in almost every instance, determine his character for life. As he is then careful or careless, prudent or improvident, industrious or indolent, truthful or dissimulating, intelligent or ignorant, temperate or dissolute, so will he be in future years; and it needs no prophet to cast his horoscope or calculate his chances in life.

The road mending in Paris is an example to all the world. The Pont Royal needed relaying, and, in the dead of the night, carts brought all the stones, and a steam-roller, weighing thirty thousand kilogrammes, crushed them to pleasant pieces for horses' feet and carriage wheels before the traffic of morning commenced.

Louis Napoleon is building a $5,000,000 opera house in Paris, which will rival in extent and grandeur the Coliseum at Rome. Nothing combustible will enter into its composition. It will cover over seven and a half acres, and be 200 feet in external height.

Upon a beam of one of the houses recently pulled down near Notre Dame, Paris, the following inscription was cut in the wood: "I was placed here in the year 1459, and was six hundred years old when they took me from the forest."

Nothing prevents a person from being natural and easy so much as an extreme desire to appear so.

Reading is the ally, not the adversary of genius: and he who reads in a proper spirit can scarcely read too much.

When we are alone, we have our thoughts to watch; in our families, our tempers; and in society, our tongues.

NO FORFEITING.—Heretofore, if a person holding a Life Policy became unfortunate, and could not raise the sum of money required to pay his next premium, his policy was declared forfeited. The BROOKLYN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK has decided to make EVERY POLICY it issues NON-FORFEITABLE, giving a PAID-UP POLICY to the party if unable to continue his payments of premiums. The dividends of the Brooklyn Life Insurance Company are settled annually in cash. This plan is far more acceptable to insurers than at the end of three or five years, as in other companies. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company allows thirty days grace in the payment of premiums. Its policies are incontestable, and its losses are promptly paid. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company offers every known plan of Life and Endowment Insurance. Get a pamphlet at the office, 240 Montgomery street, southeast corner of Pine, from Stephen T. King, General Manager, or David B. Arrowsmith, Local Agent.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A SUMMER AND WINTER MEDICINE.

"Great oaks from little acorns grow."

The worst diseases known to the human race spring from causes so small as to almost defy detection. The volumes of scientific lore that fill the tables and shelves of the medical fraternity only go to prove and elaborate these facts.

Then guard yourselves while you may. The smallest pimple on the skin is a tell-tale and indicator of disease. It may fade and die away from the surface of the body, but it will reach the vitals, perhaps, at last, and death be the result and final close. Maggiel's Bilious, Dyspeptic and Diarrhœa Pills cure where all others fail. While for Burns, Scalds, Chilblains, Cuts, and all abrasions of the skin, Maggiel's Salve is infallible. Sold by J. Maggiel, 43 Fulton street, New York, and all Druggists, at 25 cents per box.

HALL'S SARSAPARILLA AND YELLOW DOCK AND IODIDE OF POTASS.

Best Blood Purifier Known.

Persons that are troubled with Rheumatism, Scrofula, Neuralgia, Morbid Liver, Salt Rheum, Pimples, Boils, or any of the many diseases that originate from Impure Blood, would find it much to their advantage to give this justly celebrated article a trial. One or two bottles are quite sufficient to convince the most skeptical of its merits. It contains neither Spirit, ARSENIC nor MERCURY which cannot be truly said of any other prepation called "Sarsaparilla."

LARGE EYES.

LARGE eyes have always been admired, especially in women, and may be considered essential to the highest order of beauty, in almost every description of which, from Helen of Troy to Lola Montes, they hold a prominent place, We read of "large spiritual eyes," and "eyes loving large;" and also of "little, sparkling, beady eyes," to which the epithets "spiritual" and "loving" are never applied.

An Arab expresses his idea of the beauty of a woman by saying that she has the eye of a gazelle. This is the burden of his song. The timidity, gentleness, and the inocent fear in the eye of the "deer" tribe are compared with the modesty of the young girl. "Let her be as the loving hind and the pleasant roe."

Persons with large eyes give us the impression of being "wide awake," and ready for action, while small-eyed people have more generally "a sleepy look" and a sluggish temperament or habit of body. Dr. Redfield observes, that "persons with large eyes have very lively emotions, think very rapidly, and speak fast, unless there be a predominance of the phlegmatic temperament. Of persons with small eyes, the reverse is true. The former are quick and spontaneous in their feelings, and in the expression of them, and are therefore simple, like the Scotch, Swiss, and all who inhabit mountainous regions. The latter are slow and calculating, and, therefore, artful, like the Gypsies, a people who generally inhabit level countries. There is a connection between activity and the ascending and desending acclivities, a fact which we evince in running up and down stairs, and which an active horse exhibits when he comes to a hill; and hence the Scotch Highlanders, as well as the sheep, goat, chamois, etc., have large eyes and very great activity."

EITHER the taste for novel-reading is on the decline, in England, or the number of three-volume novels appearing from the various publishing houses is too great for the market. At Mudie's, and other large Westend libraries, the number of each novel now "subscribed for," is only about half of the quantity usually taken five or six years ago.

A Western horse-tamer advertises a performing horse, that will kick a cigar out of the mouth of any one in the audience, who chooses to let him, without touching the face of the smoker.

MOODS.

ON the Summer day
Heaven was gay,
Flowers and sunshine along the way.
I loitered and stood
In listless mood,
With many a sigh,
I knew not why;
Nothing was pleasant; nothing good.

On the Winter day,
Heaven was gray—
Coldness and mire along the way!
How or where
Had I cast off care?
For light and strong,
With a snatch of song,
I stepped through the mud and biting air.

SHERIDAN'S VINOUS ELOQUENCE.—The following ancedote of Sheridan's vinous eloquence has been related by one of the oldest surviving friends and followers of Fox, and himself a highly influential whig of the old school. This gentleman and Sheridan had dined together at Bellamy's; and Sheridan having taken his allowance, gave his accustomed signal for a move. The signal consisted of the words, "Now I shall go down and see what's doing in the house;" which in reality meant, and was always so interpreted by whoever dined in his company. "I have drank enough: my share of the buisness is done; now do yours; call for the bill, and pay for it." On this occasion the usual course was pursued; and the bill having been settled by Sheridan's friend, the latter, hearing that Sheridan was "up," felt curious to know what he could possibly be at, knowing the "glorious" state in which he had just departed. Accordingly, he entered the house, and, to his no small astonishment, found Sheridan in a fit of most fervent oratory, thundering forth the well-known passage: "Give them a corrupt House of Lords; give them a venal House of Commons; give them a tyrannical prinee; give them a truekling court; and let me but have an unfettered press, and I will defy them to encroach a hair's breadth upon the liberties of England!"

EZEKIEL AND DANIEL.—The following anecdote of Mr. Webster is told by a correspondent of the Cleveland Herald, as an illustration of the "uncertainty of worldly fame," and the folly of making it the controlling object of life:—

A few years since, but before the great Northern Railroad passed through his farm, he was on his way to the old homestead. He took the stage at Concord, New Hampshire, and had for a companion a very old man. After some conversation, he ascertained that the old man was from the neighboring town of Salisbury, and asked him if he ever knew Captain Webster.

"Surley I did," said the old man; "and the captain was a brave and good man, sir; and nobly did he fight for us, with General Stark at Bennington."

"Did he leave any children?" said Mr. Webster.

"O, yes; there was Ezekiel, and I think Daniel."

"and what has become of them?" asked Mr. Webster.

"Why, Ezekiel—and he was a powerful man, sir—I have heard him plead in court often; yes, sir, he was a powerful man, and fell dead while pleading at Concord."

"Well," said Mr. Webster, "and what became of Daniel?"

"Daniel—Daniel" repeated the old man, thoughtfully; "why, Daniel, I believe, is a lawyer about Boston somewhere."

AN official in Chicago recently bought a ticket in a lottery, for the purpose of obtaining evidence against the proprietors, and indicting them; but the ticket happened to draw a thousand-dollar prize, and the officer is not inclined to prosecute.

LABOR.

WARM-HEARTED Labor in the fields
Is nobler than the courts of state,
For she, at least, with truth can say,
That all her ends are good and great.
She moves, a princess, full of smiles,
With ripened plenty in her arms,
And casts about her gifts, and sees
The hillsides fall of golden charms.

She comes by helts of ripened corn,
And vines that hend with purple wealth,
By orchards dropping crimson fruits,
Blowing the golden airs of health.
She wears a four fold crown, hegirt
With the four seasons, flashing hright
On all her children as they come,
Gathering aronnd her with delight.

She goes by streams and dusty mills.
By meadows full of purple hloom;
All perfect in her godliness,
With hlessings for the humhlest home.
She walks on solid ground, and hares
Her hrow to feel the hreath of morn,
And hears the hugle breezes hlow
Among the emerald-hladed corn.

She dots the sea with stately ships,
And looks across the world to see
Her harvests grow, her reapers reap
The golden grain in harmony.
She moves, and all her steps are flash
With starry flowers and healing halm,
She looks on passion, and the storm
Is hashed, and all is pure and calm.

New York Citizen. W. A. TAYLOR.

BRIGHAM YOUNG'S LAST WIFE.—"Amelin," or Brigham Young's last wife, has the andacity to snnb the prophet and do as she pleases. She is described ns tall. well-formed, with light hair, gray eyes, and regular features, but quite pale from ill health, and with little or no refinement of manner. When at the theatre, sitting in the king's box with her husband, the observed of all observers, she may be seen eating apples and throwing the skins about, alternately chatting with Brigham and levelling her glass at some one in the assembly. She leads the ton, and is the model woman for the saints. At all times she is the gayest of the gay, and at others she treats her liege lord rather shabbily. She is notional, imperious, and somewhat coquettish, to all of which Brigham submits, and pets her as a child. Servants are at her disposal, and her establishment is extensive and imposing. Brigham often dines with his new wife. One evening a friend was taking tea with them, and Amelia was in bad humor. After tea they remained at the table eating nuts, and Amelia threw her shells through an open window on the opposite side of the room. Her husband said: "Amelia, don't do that; put your shells on your plate." "I shan't do it," replied the fair one; "I'll throw the shells where I please." Young was silent for a time, but became so annoyed that he again said: "Amelia, I wish yon wouldn't do that any more." "I don't care," replied she, "I'll throw the shells where I please, and do as I please, and you may help yourself." And pulling her guest by the dress, she said: "Come, let's go up stairs and let him grunt it out."

QUEER thing is an insurance policy. If I can't sell it, I can cel it, and if I can-cel it, I can't sell it.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND

IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, und none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fnel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected hy letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and hack flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may he held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied hy the waste heat und without extra fael.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the hath-room equal to any range.

☞ Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

THE LIGHT OF THE WORLD.

DR. MAGGIEL'S

Pills and Salve.

These Life-giving remedies are now, for the first time, given publicly to the world. For over a quarter of a century of private practice the ingredients in these

LIFE-GIVING PILLS!

Have been used with the greatest success. Their mission is not only to prevent disease, hnt to cnre. They search out the various maladies by which the patient is suffering, and re-invigorate the failing system. To the aged and infirm a few doses of these valuable PILLS will prove to be

A VERY FOUNTAIN OF YOUTH,

For in every case they add new life and vitality, and restore the waning energies to their pristine state. To the young and middle-aged, they will prove most invaluable, as a ready, specific, and sterling medicine. Here is a dream realized, that Ponce-de-Leon sought for three hundred years ago, and never found. He looked for a fountain that would restore the old to vigor and make youth ever

AN ETERNAL SPRING!

It was left for this day and hour to realize the dream, and show in one glorious fact, the magic that made it fair.

THESE FAMOUS REMEDIES

Cannot stay the flight of years, hut they can force hack, and hold aloof, diseases that might triumph over the aged and the young. Let none hesitate then, hut seize the favorable opportunity that offers. When taken as prescribed—

FOR BILLIOUS DISORDERS

Nothing can he more productive of cure than these Pills. Their almost magic influence is felt at once; and the usual concomitants of this most distressing disease are removed. These remedies are made from the purest

VEGETABLE COMPOUND.

They will not harm the most delicate female, and can be given with good effect in prescribed doses to the youngest babe.

FOR CUTANEOUS DISORDERS

And all eruptions of the skin, the SALVE is most invaluable. It does not heal externally alone, hut penetrates with the most searching effects to the ver root of the evil!

Dr. Maggiel's Pills

Invariably cure the following diseases:

Asthma,
Bowel Complaints,
Coughs,
Colds,
Chest Diseases,
Costiveness,
Dyspepsia,
Diarrhœa,
Dropsy,
Debility,
Female Complaints, Fever and Ague,

THE BLACKSMITH'S WIFE.

BY AUGUSTUS COMSTOCK.

SHE has a figure trim and neat,
And full of health and life,
With nimble hands and nimble feet,
The blacksmith's little wife.

Her hair is dark, her eyes are blue,
And though her cheek is browned,
An anchorite would smile to view
A face so smooth and round.

All day she labors like the bee,
The blacksmith's little wife,
While round her play her children three,
Bright-haired and full of life.

And all day long, her cheery song
Comes through the cottage door,
While tap, tap, tap, her gaiters rap
The neatly sanded floor.

Her swarthy husband, from the town,
Comes home when day is dim;
For kisses he must stoop 'way down,
Or she climb up to him.

He's just the man that women crave
To shield them from "the wrong,"
For he's as kind as he is brave,
As brave as he is strong.

"You're tired out with work," she sighs;
"You lead a weary like."
"No, no," quoth he, "'tis Paradise,
With such a little wife."

The gleeful fire with ardent rays
Peeps slyly from the hearth,
The tea-pot blushes in the blaze,
The kettle shakes with mirth.

The sleek "grimalkin" purs and mews,
The dog whines at the door,
The pattering of little shoes
Is heard along the floor.

About the smith the children play
When evening's meal is through,
They love to see his pipe of clay
Send forth its clouds of blue.

They clamber on his shoulders broad,
They clamber on his knee,
While wife looks on with smile and nod:
And all are full of glee.

I'd sooner be this blacksmith bold,
With such a little wife,
Than have the wealth of yellow gold
That gilds an aimless life.

COMMON SENSE.—He who sedulously listens, pointedly asks, calmly speaks, coolly answers, and ceases when he has no more to say to the point, evinces most common sense and promptness of character, and shows that he is fitted for business and likely to succeed.

A DOWN east editor, in describing a country dance, says: "The gorgeous strings of glass beads glistened on the heaving bosoms of the village belles like polished rubies resting on the delicate surface of warm apple dumplings."

THE BEST OF SPIRITS.—A reporter, in describing a meeting of a total abstinence society, said that "they had a most harmonious and profitable session, and retired from the hall full of the best of spirits."

IT makes a great difference whether glasses are used over or under the nose.

24 FINE STEEL PORTRAITS,

giving a full and authentic account of the rise and fall of the late Southern Confederacy. Written under the encouragement of Generals R. E. Lee, Johnston, Beauregard and others. The work is being liberally patronized by leading men of all classes, eager to hear and thus arrive at the truth of history, which it is impossible to do from the many histories written only from a Northern stand-point.

"THE OTHER SIDE,"

Agents and the public are cautioned against any other work purporting to be this one. To energetic men and women a rare chance is offered to make money. Don't fail to send for circulars of this great and important work. Address

AYER'S

Cathartic Pills,

ARE THE MOST PERFECT purgative which we are able to produce, or which we think has ever yet been made by anybody. Their effects have abundantly shown to the community how much they excel the ordinary medicines in use. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. Their penetrating properties stimulate the vital activities of the body, remove the obstructions of its organs, purify the blood, and expel disease. They purge out the foul humors which breed and grow distemper, stimulate sluggish or disordered organs into their natural action, and impart a healthy tone with strength to the whole system. Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases. While they produce powerful effects, they are at the same time, in diminished doses, the safest and best physic that can be employed for children. Being sugar-coated, they are pleasant to take; and, being purely vegetable, are free from any risk of harm. Cures have been made which surpass belief, were they not substantiated by men of such exalted position and character, as to forbid the suspicion of untruth. Many eminent clergymen and physicians have lent their names to certify to the public the reliability of our remedies, while others have sent us the assurance of their conviction that our Preparations contribute immensely to the relief of our afflicted, suffering fellow men.

The Agent below named is pleased to furnish gratis our American Almanac, containing directions for the use and certificates of their cures, of the following complaints.

Costiveness, Bilious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache arising from foul stomach, Nausea, Indigestion, Morbid Inaction of the Bowels and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Diseases which require an evacuant medicine. They also, by purifying the blood and stimulating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach, such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability, Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout, and other kindred complaints arising from a low state of the body, or obstruction of its functions.

Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand AYER'S and take no others. The sick want the best aid there is for them, and they should have it.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure. But

NEWELL'S

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded or the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup.

HAIR RESTORER.

THIS IS A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY, and stands above comparison with any other article for the Hair ever brought before the public.

A PERFECT

Hair Restorer AND Hair Dresser

BOTH COMBINED IN ONE.

First—It is not a Dye.
Second—Will not Color the Skin.
Third—Will restore Gray Hair to a beautiful Black, Brown, Auburn, or whatever might have been its original color, and cause it to assume its former beauty.
Fourth—Will cure all Humors and Diseases of the Scalp.
Fifth—Will remove Dandruff and Scurf from the head, and keep the hair moist and silk like in its appearance as in youthful days.
Sixth—Will promote a healthy growth.
Seventh—Will prevent it from falling off, and cause it to grow on bald heads where there is life and vitality at the roots, but where these are gone there is no hope of success.
Eighth—The best testimony that can be given will be found inside of each bottle.

Warranted to do all we claim for it, or the money refunded after using two bottles. Try it and be convinced.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea-sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

BESSIE SHIELDS, Plaintiff, vs. PETER SHIELDS, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to PETER SHIELDS, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and for general relief and costs.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 1st day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six.

THE JUMPING FROG OF CALAVERAS.

[In compliance with very frequent requests we re-publish the following, which is the most popular of all of "Mark Twain's" humorous sketches. The writer introduces his story by stating that he visited Angel's Camp at the request of one Artemus Ward, to seek information of a friend of his—the Rev. Leonidas Greeley. In answer to his queries he is referred to an old resident of the Camp since '49, one Simon Wheeler, whom he found dozing over a bar-room stove; and, upon being roused and interrogated, he blockades "Mark" in the corner and relates the following story of the only Greeley who ever lived in the Camp.]

THERE was a feller here once by the name of Jim Greeley, in the winter of '49—or maybe it was the Spring of '50—I don't recollect exactly, some how, though what makes me think it was one or the is because I remember the big flume wasn't finished when he first come to the camp; but anyway he was the curiosest man about always betting on anything that turned up you ever see, if he could get anybody to bet on the other side, and if he couldn't he'd change sides—any way that suited the other man would suit him—any way just so's he got a bet, he was satisfied. But still, he was lucky—uncommon lucky; he most always come out winner. He was always ready and laying for a chance; there couldn't be no solitry thing mentioned but that feller'd offer to bet on it—and take any side you please, as I was just telling you: if there was a horse race, you'd find him flush or you find him busted at the end of it; if there was a dog-fight, he'd bet on it; if there was a cat-fight, he'd bet on it; if there was a chicken-fight, he'd bet on it; why if there was two birds sitting on a fence, he would bet you which one would fly first—or if there was a camp-meeting he would be there reglar to bet on Parson Walker, which he judged to be the best exhorter about here, and so he was, too, and a good man; if he even see a straddle-bug start to go any wheres, he would bet you how long it would take him to get wherever he was going to, and if you took him up he would foller that straddle-bug to Mexico but what he would find out where he was bound for and how long he was on the road. Lots of the boys here has seen that Greeley and can tell you about him. Why, it never made no difference to him—he would bet on anything—the dangdest feller. Parson Walker's wife laid very sick, once, for a good while, and it seemed as if they warn't going to save her; but one morning he come in and Greeley asked how she was, and he said she was considerable better—thank the Lord for his inf'nit mercy—and coming on so smart that with the blessing of Providence she'd get well yet—and Greeley, before he thought, says: "Well, I'll risk two-and-a-half that she don't, anyway."

Thish-yer Greeley had a mare—the boys called her the fifteen-minute nag, but that was only in fun, you know, because, of course, she was faster than that—and he used to win money on that horse, for all she was so slow and always had the asthma, or the distemper, or the consumption, or something of that kind. They used to give her two or three hundred yards' start, and then pass her under way; but always at the fag-end of the race she'd get excited and desperate like, and come cavorting and spraddling up, and scattering her legs around limber, sometimes in the air, and sometimes out to one side amongst the fences, and kicking up m-o-r-e dust, and raising m-o-r-e racket with her coughing and sneezing and blowing her nose—and always fetch up at the stand just about a neck ahead, as near as you could cipher it down.

And he had a little small bull pup, that to look at him you'd think he wan't worth a cent, but to set around and look onery, and lay for a chance to steal something. But as soon as money was up on him he was a different dog—his underjaw'd begin to stick out like the for'castle of a steamboat, and his teeth would uncover, and shine savage like the furnaces. And a dog might tackle him, and bully-rag him, and bite him, and throw him over his shoulder two or three times, and Andrew Jackson—which was the name of the pup—Andrew Jackson would never let on but what he was satisfied, and hadn't expected nothing else—and the bets being doubled and doubled on the other side all the time, till the money was all up—and then all of a sudden he would grab that other dog just by the joint of his hind leg and freeze to it—not chaw, you understand, but only just grip and hang on till they throwed up the sponge, if it was a year. Greeley always came out winner on that pup till he harnessed a dog once that didn't have no hind legs, because they'd been sawed off by a circular saw, and when the thing had gone along far enough, and the money was all up, and he come to make a snatch for his pet holt, he saw in a minute how he'd been imposed on, and how the other dog had him in the door, so to speak, and he 'peared surprised, and then he looked sorter discouraged like, and didn't try no more to win the fight, and so he got shucked out bad. He give Greeley a look as much as to say his heart was broke, and it was his fault, for putting up a dog that hadn't no hind legs for him to take holt of, which was his main dependence in a fight, and then he limped off a piece, and laid down and died. It was a good pup, was that Andrew Jackson, and would have made a name for himself if he'd lived, for the stuff was in him, and he had genius—I know it, because he hadn't had no opportunities to speak of, and it don't stand to reason that a dog could make such a fight as he could under them circumstances, if he hadn't no talent. It always makes me feel sorry when I think of that last fight of his'n, and the way it turned out.

Well, thish-yer Greeley had rat-tarriers and chicken cocks, and tom cats, and all them kind of things, till you couldn't rest, and you couldn't fetch nothing for him to bet on but he'd match you. He ketched a frog one day and took him home and said he cal'lated to educate him; and so he never done nothing for three months but set in his back yard and learn that frog to jump. And you bet you he did learn him, too. He'd give him a little punch behind, and the next minute you'd see that frog whirling in the air like a doughnut—see him turn one summerset, or maybe a couple, if he got a good start, and come down flat-footed and all right, like a cat. He got him up so in the matter of catching flies, and kept him in practice so constant, that he'd nail a fly every time as far as he could see him. Greeley said all a frog wanted was education, and he could do most anything—and I believe him. Why, I've seen him send Dan'l Webster down here on this floor—Dan'l Webster was the name of the frog—and sing out "Flies! Dan'l, flies," and quicker'n you could wink, he'd spring straight up, and snake a fly off'n the counter there, and flop down on the floor again as solid as a gob of mud, and fall to scratching the side of his head with his hind foot as indifferent as if he hadn't no idea he'd doin' any more'n any frog might do. You never see a frog so modest and straight for'ard as he was, for all he was so gifted. And when it come to fair-and square jumping on a dead level, he could get over more ground at one straddle than any animal of his breed you ever see. Jumping on a dead level was his strong suit, you understand, and when it come to that, Greeley would bet up money on him as long as he had a red. Greeley was monstrous proud of his frog, and well he might be, for fellers that had travelled and been everywheres, all said he laid over any frog that ever they see.

Well, Greeley kept the beast in a little lattice box, and he used to fetch him down town sometimes and lay for a bet. One day a feller—a stranger in the camp, he was—come across him with his box, and says:

"What might it be that you've got in the box?"

And Greeley says, sorter indifferent like, "It might be a parrot, or it might be a canary, maybe, but it ain't—it's only just a frog."

And the feller took it, and looked at it careful, and turned it round this way and that, and says, "H'm—so 'tis. Well, what's he good for?"

"Well," Greeley says, easy and careless, "He's good enough for one thing I should judge—he can out-jump any frog in Calaveras county."

The feller took the box again, and took another long, particular look, and give it back to Greeley and says, very deliberate, "Well—I don't see no points about that frog that's any better'n any other frog."

"Maybe you don't," Greeley says. "Maybe you understand frogs, and maybe you don't understand 'em; maybe you've had experience, and maybe you ain't only a amature, as it were. Anyways, I've got my opinion, and I'll resk forty dollars that he can outjump any frog in Calaveras county."

And the feller studied a minute, and then says, kinder sad, like, "Well—I'm only a stranger here, and I ain't got no frog—but if I had a frog I'd bet you."

And then Greeley says, "That's all right—that's all right—if you'll hold my box a minute I'll go and get you a frog; and so the feller took the box, and put up his forty dollars along with Greeley's, and set down to wait.

So he set there a good while thinking and thinking to hisself, and then he got the frog out and prized his mouth open and took a teaspoon and filled him full of quail shot—filled him pretty near up to his chin—and set him on the floor. Greeley he went to the swamp and slopped around in the mud for a long time, and finally he ketched a frog and fetched him in and give him to this feller and says:

"Now if you're ready, set him alongside of Dan'l, with his fore-paws just even with Dan'l, and I'll give the word." Then he says, "one—two—three—jump!" and him and the feller touched up the frogs from behind, and the new frog hopped off, but Dan'l give a heave, and hysted up his shoulders—so—like a Frenchman, but it wa'nt no use—he couldn't budge; he was planted as solid as an anvil, and he couldn't no more stir than if he was anchored out. Greeley was a good deal surprised, and he was disgusted too, but he didn't have no idea what the matter was, of course.

The feller took the money and started away, and when he was going out at the door he sorter jerked his thumb over his shoulders—this way—at Dan'l, and says again, very deliberate: "Well—I don't see no points about that frog that's any better'n any other frog."

Greeley he stood scratching his head and looking down at Dan'l a long time, and at last he says, "I do wonder what in the nation that frog throw'd off for—I wonder if there ain't something the matter with him—he 'pears to look mighty baggy, somehow," and he ketched Dan'l by the nap of the neck, and lifted him up and says, "Why blame my cats if he don't weigh five pound," and turned him upside down, and he belched out about a double handful of shot. And then he see how it was, and he was the maddest man—he set the frog down and took out after that feller, but he never ketched him. And——

[Here Simon Wheeler heard his name called from the front-yard, and got up to see what was wanted.] And turning to me as he moved away, he said: "Just set where you are, stranger, and rest easy—I ain't going to be gone a second."

But by your leave, I did not think that a continuation of the history of the enterprising vagabond Jim Greeley would be likely to afford me much information concerning the Rev. Leonidas W. Greeley, and so I started away.

At the door I met the sociable Wheeler returning, and he buttonholed me and recommenced:

"Well, thish-yer Greeley had a yaller one-eyed cow that didn't have no tail only just a short stump like a bannanner, and——"

"O, curse Greeley and his afflicted cow!" I muttered, good-naturedly, and bidding the old gentleman good-day, I departed.

Yours truly, MARK TWAIN.

THE MEETING.

I MET her in the quiet lane
One Sabbath morning early;
The sun was bright, although the rain
Still glittered on the barley.
The lark was singing to his mate,
The wild bells chimed their warning,
We paused awhile outside the gate;
We lingered till it was too late
To go to church that morning!

Again we met. The whisp'ring leaves
Glanced nigh in sight and shadow;
The reapers piled the yellow sheaves;
The bees hummed o'er the meadow.
The royal sun rose up in state,
Our marriage-day adorning;
The bells rang out; wide stood the gate,
And neither of us was too late
To go to church that morning!

FROM DEATH TO LIFE.

EAGER sails surged by and vanished into mist like the thoughts that had haunted me of late: straight as if from a line dropped the sun, rayless, red, and wrathful, behind the hills, and in an instant fell the gray shudder and coolness of the twilight over dimpling water and flashing sky, and creeping up the lawn between the gaunt trees struck me like a foreboding of new evil, and sent me hurrying to the house.

The wind that had stilled a moment as if watching the sun, rose again and followed me; not with long fitful sweeps, dying away in high, plaintive moans, but with a heavy continuous roar like that of the sea, rolling up in waves of sound and breaking with such fury against the broad front of our old house, that I shut the door and drew the curtains, as though some fierce living creature were pressing hard after me.

Warmth and light streamed out to meet me from the grate; rosy and golden, catching the gleam of silver on the sideboard and purple and amber tints from the glass in the cabinets; but with the thickening twilight masses of strange shadows were twisting and tangling themselves in with the heavy sweep of the curtains, as though the thing that thundered without, and gibbered and wailed in the chimneys, was lurking there and might spring up and take goblin form before me.

I was shrinking uneasily from the bare idea when the patter of little feet on the stairs, and a quick cry of mingled terror and anger struck sharply on my ear and sent me hurrying into the hall. It was nearly dark, but the faint ray shining through the sidelights fell full on my husband's face, who had come I knew not how, since I had heard neither crunching of wheels or jar of heavy doors, not even a whine from "Leo." His face was pale, his eyes black with wicked fire, but he nodded and even smiled as I came out (if that ghastly drawing away of the lips that showed white under his moustache, from his glittering pointed teeth, could be termed a smile.)

I gave him not so much as a glance of surprise in answer, for though the look photographed itself deep in my memory, and afterward took life and meaning and grew to be the nightmare of my thoughts and dreams, I received it, reasoning about it at the moment no more than the senseless camera; for by my husband stood Marie, a French woman, and his protegé, holding fast, with an ugly smile on her face, my boy Ralph, my golden haired baby—his violet eyes all aflame, his cheeks glowing, as he struck fiercely at her with his little dimpled hands. Instinctively she dropped his arm as I came out. The child ran to me and I took him up, nestling his dear head in my neck and kissing him to still his frightened crying.

"Put him down," said my husband, harshly, but without looking at me. "He is a young rebel."

"He will not go with me. He refuse absolutely," exclaimed the French woman.

"Why should he go?" asked I, coldly.

Marie shrugged her shoulders and jerked her head in the direction of my husband, who stood still, looking away and biting savagely at his long blonde moustache.

"Monsieur can explain."

"There is no need of explanation. It is enough that it is my will."

"It is not mine, then, and it shall not be done," answered I sharply, and still holding Ralph I turned toward the dining-room door. Fury blazed redly up in my husband's ghastly face and he stepped hastily toward me, but he checked himself instantly, only saying low, to Marie, "Take him." The brown fingers of the French woman twitched and clutched at each other convulsively, and her eyes glared out at me from under their half-closed lids like some wild beast about to spring, but she folded her arms resolutely across her broad breast, and said:

"Not if Madame still oppose herself."

"Say rather," cried I, with my hand on the door, "when I lay stark and senseless in death. Not till then will I give you my boy, my sole comfort."

Marie answered by the all-expressive shrug and an inexplicable gesture toward my husband, who was fumbling nervously with his handkerchief. As he came toward me, holding it oddly crumbled in his hand, something seemed to strike at my brain and heart. I reeled, but was startled back into life by my darling's cry.

"Mamma, hold Ralph tight. Don't drop me."

My husband came closer.

"Are you mad, Bella?"

"No, but you are."

"But hear reason. Your life and health depend—"

"My boy is my life and health. He shall not leave me unless for heaven, and then I will follow him."

Ralph nestled uneasily.

"Mamma, tighter. I am falling.

"No, my darling, not from my arms;" but even as I spoke I felt him slide from my grasp, for it seemed as if the sea was upon me, striking faintness to my heart, swaying me as it does the dead in its caverns, sounding melodiously in my ears, surging and dashing up around me till my breath came in quick, short pants. Then the bells began to chime. They were funeral bells, but very sweet, and with that I floated away on the billows till there opened before me a mighty cathedral, and Ralph and I were walking up an aisle that was all one golden glory. From somewhere pealed suddenly an organ, and waves of harmony rolled out that bore us up, higher and higher toward the dome of height.

"This is heaven," said I, "but why have we left earth?"

"Ask your husband, you stumbling block," answered a scornful voice, * * * and all was silent, and I was awake, lying on the bed in my own room in the midst of shadow only half dispelled by the flaring candle on the table.

There was a sickening smell of ether in the room and a curious feeling in my throat and mouth. My first thought was of Ralph, but he was not there. I ran to the door that opened on the hall. It was locked. I tried the one going into my husband's room. That, too, was fast. I laid my hand on the bell. The cord was cut. My windows opened only on a light balcony that neighbored nothing but the black river and the gaunt trees. I was betrayed and a prisoner; and my baby—my child—my ears that should have heard him even in the stillness of the tomb, had been deaf to his cries. My traitorous arms had lost him from their grasp, though mighty love should have given them life and force to save him were I dead.

For a time I think I was raving mad. I dashed my hands against the door. I screamed wildly for help. I even went to the balcony to throw myself down, but my watchful angel held me back; and, worn out, I fell at last on my bed and in sleep cheated my misery of some hours of torture.

The morning came, raw and ghostlike, with mist, as I looked out on it, lying on my bed, bound mind and body by the reaction of my terrible excitement, with a languor that was in itself a pain; yet conscious—keenly conscious that there was no little golden head nestling on the lace-edged pillow in the crib by my side, and that the horror of yesterday was only the incarnation of the tangible something that had filled me with shuddering, and covered me with shadow, since the reading of that most mistaken will—my father's will—that made my darling and myself the luckless barriers between my husband and my long coveted estate. Only after our decease was he its master—and a child holds life by such a tender thread! Once away from me, how easy for Ralph to die? and he once in Heaven; how could I remain behind? Why, any fool, interpreting that will by my husband's face, might have been a prophet, and months before proclaimed my desolation.

So thought I, crying out on myself with awful self reproach, falling away into heavy sleep, in which I continually, in a helpless, tangled, dizzy way, went over my miserable thoughts, starting out of it to take up the web of dark forboding at the very thread where I had laid it down—all this time without a thought of God, only that He had brought this misery upon me, and, therefore, it was useless to look to Him for help.

At length a lock creaked, and a tray was thrust in through the partially open door, on which was my breakfast, and the following lines in my husband's handwriting:

"When you give in writing your free and uncondition consent to my plans regarding Ralph, you shall be restored to the world and to life not before."

My consent! I could not understand. Why was that required when Marie already had the child? I wearied myself in brain over it.

Another morning came, and I was startled out of sleep by a cry from Ralph. I could have sworn it was his voice, even before I reached the door outside of which I heard him struggling and calling out: "Mamma, mamma, why don't you let Ralph in, mamma?"

It was Marie's voice that told him "Mamma was very sick," and then I heard Miss Vernon, his governess, soothing him as she led him away. As I heard the patter of his dear feet dying away, my whole soul rebelled, and cried out as though it would burst its bonds. O, my darling! close to my arms, and I could not reach him! going away, and I might never look in his eyes again.

All the old madness was surging back upon me, when my pitying angel whispered (I say my angel, for I know well that my poor tortured brain had no power to call my dear hope back to life):

"Ralph is here because the wary French woman will not take him without your consent. While you have the courage not to go mad or die, he will be here and safe."

The thought electrified me into life. Despair only comes when there is no longer an object for which to suffer, and the dearest one I could ever know was now given me. I had neglected food, but now I ate to strengthen myself. I had scarcely glanced out, but now I opened the long glass doors and went out on the balcony.

It was yet early Spring. The air was humid, the sky pale and soft, the river lovely in a veiled brightness, the brown tufted shore-lines opposite melting away in feathery mist. Sails glanced through the net-work of the leafless trees and wandered out into the light like spirits. Opposite, the sunlight struck full on a veined and purple rock rounding out like a castle keep. Further up, just in the gap, between retreating hills on the one side, and jutting, wooded battlements on the other, like a pearl in enamel setting swayed and balanced a tiny vessel, dazzling white in the sunlight. Near the house gurgled and chirrupped merry little birds, raising eyes of thankfulness to Heaven, and darting continually in and out among the leafless, orange-hued boughs of the willow, whose flexile curves traced out something like the painted arches of a cathedral.

My eyes and heart filled together, and falling on my knees, I found myself crying out with tears and sobbing:

"Thy will be done, oh! Mighty Father! Thy will be done; and give me strength to bear it."

Unconsciously I had uttered the words aloud, and, as if in answer, came a curious rubbing, grating sound. Looking up, I saw—

But this part of my story is best explained by the evidence of Miss Vernon, Ralph's governess, given in writing during the progress of a trial which at the time excited no small attention.

EDITH VERNON'S DEPOSITION.

"I am unmarried, and twenty-five years of age. My name is Edith P. Vernon. Since the 25th of September last I have acted as nursery governess to Ralph, only son of Dr. and Mrs. Magruder. During the time that I have been a member of his family, the behavior of the Doctor has been often brutal and violent, and never at any time calculated to inspire respect and affection. After the death of Mr. Horst (Mrs. Magruder's father) and the reading of his will, which occurred in November, the Doctor, if possible, became more morose than before. I heard the will freely commented on by the old house servants and by Mrs. Magruder herself, who said that it was dictated by a most mistaken kindness, and would yet be the cause of bitter affliction. I also heard Mr. Magruder swear that he would have the contrary old fool's (her father's) money, in spite of him or his lawyer.

On the afternoon of the 19th of March (I know the date, having recorded it in my diary) I was coming down from the nursery, when I saw Dr. Magruder and Marie Moreau, a French woman, standing at the foot of the stairs. I heard Mrs. Magruder talking excitedly, and looking over the balusters, saw her by the dining-room door, very pale, and holding Ralph in her arms. I saw the Doctor go up to her in what I then thought a singular manner; but, unwilling to learn more, went back to the nursery and closed the door.

Shortly after Marie came up with Ralph and commenced to undress him, saying that she was ordered to do so by Mrs. Magruder. I was surprised, as Mrs. Magruder was well aware of the relations existing between her husband and Marie, but made no comments. Ralph was crying violently, and insisted on it that papa had killed his dear mamma. On asking for Mrs. Magruder, I was told that she was sick and could see no one. Going into the lower hall, I found it filled with the fumes of ether, and lying by the dining-room door Mrs. Magruder's headdress. It was an elaborate affair, fastened on by long ornamental pins, and I felt convinced that it could not have been lost only in a violent struggle. I was so disturbed that I went to the Doctor and begged to see Mrs. Magruder. He ordered me back to the nursery with a savage refusal. I then, while he was at dinner went to the door of her room and found it locked, and Marie, who saw me there, told me in a threatening way that I had better not meddle, and that if I wanted orders I could apply to her, as she was mistress during Mrs. Magruder's illness.

In the morning, meeting her again with a small tray in her hand, I asked what that was, and after a little hesitation she told me, angrily, that it was Mrs. Magruder's breakfast.

I saw the Doctor come out of his study holding a slip of paper, and not daring to linger went on to the nursery, but before closing the door I heard a key turn, and Ralph, who was behind, came in sobing, and told me that "Marie had locked up his mamma." I was now confident that Mrs. Magruder was a prisoner, but dared not hint my suspicions, as my story would everywhere be considered as impossible, and I should at once be dismissed from the house.

That evening, as I was in the library, the Doctor and Marie came in together. I was standing behind one of the high tables and in the darkest corner of the room, and they did not see me. They spoke in French, the Doctor vehemently urging Marie to do something that I could not understand, while she steadily refused, saying over and over again that she would not give the law a hold on her. This, in connection with existing circumstances, convinced me of the existence of some foul conspiracy against Mrs. Magruder, and I no longer hesitated in trying to effect her release.

I suppose it is proper to speak here of the plan of the Magruder mansion. It was an old-fashioned double house, belonging to Mrs. Magruder, and before her marriage was known as Hurst Hall. Dr. Magruder occupied two rooms on the second floor, in the extreme end of the building. Mrs. Magruder's chamber was next his. A small vacant room, or rather a passage-way, was between her apartment and my room, (the nursery). It had a door opening on the nursery (of which I kept the key) and one going into Mrs. Magruder's room, which was never opened, her bed being placed against it.

My room (the nursery) had two doors, one opening in the hall, the other on a landing, from which a narrow flight of stairs led directly into the grounds. On the opposite side was a similar suite, of which the best chamber was tenanted by Marie. In Mrs. Magruder's room were three doors; one opening on the hall and one into the Doctor's suite, of which of course he had the keys; a third, as I have said, into the vacant room. Her windows led out on a small covered balcony, but I could not speak to her from below without exciting attention. I remembered, however, that Ralph's play-room, on the floor above, opened on the top of this balcony, and having assured myself that the Doctor and Marie were both in the library, I went up there and crept cautiously out on the zinc-tiled roof. Before long I heard the jar of the glass doors below, and a light step, as if she were passing up and down.

I had written on a slip of paper these words: "There is a door behind your bed. If you can open it you will find the door of the nursery open at twelve to-night."

I made haste now to do this up, and dropped it by a string just below the projecting cornice of one of the pillars. But still the pacing went on, and every moment increased the risk of being seen. I dared not speak. The wildest fancies went dizzily through my brain. I said to myself that the unfortunate lady was mad, or perhaps that the old tales were true, and disembodied spirits could make cheerful the spot where a great crime had been committed. I took out a small pocket-knife and began to scratch and grate it over the zinc. Still the soft, regular footfalls went on. I was turning away in despair when a sobbing voice broke out suddenly in words of prayer. I renewed the grating with the knife, and this time had the great joy to feel the string softly seized from below. With my heart beating as if it would burst out of my body, I lowered the rest of the cord and waited. In a moment I heard Mrs. Magruder say to herself, "thank God!" and then, a little louder, "I understand, and will do it." I crept in again, expecting each moment to be met and thrust out of life by the Doctor or Marie. I fancied that my nervous manner was exciting remark, and that the French woman watched me with more than cat-like vigilance.

As it was the Doctor's custom in closing the house for the night to take out the keys and carry them to his rooms, it was necessary to possess myself of the one belonging to the door at the foot of the little back stair-case. This was the easiest thing in the world to do, yet I passed in and out a dozen times before my coward fingers could draw it from the lock. Wishing Ralph to sleep heavily, at supper time I mixed laudanum with his milk. The little fellow disliked the taste, but Marie, who bore a hatred to the child, was good enough to make him drink it. The evening at length set in, and while Marie was out I oiled all the hinges and bolts whose creaking might turn traitors, unlocked the door of the vacant room, and possessed myself of two heavy shawls of Mrs. Magruder's. I did this in a mechanical, desperate way, for I was weighed down, pressed almost out of sense and action by a foreboding of failure. I knew that God was above, but, Heaven forgive me, I felt as if even His power might fail us.

Seated by Ralph's crib I waited, listening to his deep breathing and to the echoes of life pulsing in different parts of the great house. Till ten o'clock the Doctor and Marie sat below together. Then she came up, and he as usual closed the house.

Of course the key was missed and a search made, during which I felt as if Marie's eyes were burning into my pocket, and I think the evil intelligence that animated her did have some prescience of my intriguing, if only by sympathy, for, contrary to her custom, she sat in my room long after the rest had gone to bed, talking to or rather at me, in her sententious, affected way, till she drove me almost mad with impatience and disgust.

At half past eleven she left me, and then I began to listen, and I thought the very air was listening with me, the whole house was so like death. Unable to bear the suspense, I rose and opened the door of the vacant room. At the same instant appeared Mrs. Magruder on the other side. She made an eager gesture and came toward me so soundlessly that I half fancied her a ghost indeed. When she saw Ralph her very face cried out with mighty love, and longing to seize him in her arms, but I think she distrusted her own self-control, for she stepped back while I wrapped him in his blanket and lifted him from his crib.

Fast bound in his drugged sleep he offered no resistance, and muffling ourselves in the shawls we stole down the stairs, our hearts noisier than our steps. The bolts slid easily back The free air struck chilly on us. Leo, the huge Newfoundland, dashed at us with a growl, but recognizing his mistress turned and went with us, stopping sometimes and whining, by way of remonstrance.

Along the lane, close under the shadowed wall we walked softly and swiftly, out to the white, lonely road, neither of us speaking and scarce seeing each other, only I felt Mrs. Magruder's hand clinging with desperate tenacity on my arm.

Once Ralph cried low in his sleep and nestled in my aching arms, but I hushed him again. Once an awful faintness of doubt, dread and hope assailed me, and I had nearly dropped my precious burden.

At length there rose up before us a broad, white house, standing back from the road among overreaching trees. That was the house of Dr. Bernard, Mrs. Magrude's best and oldest friend.

Being used to night-alarms they were not discomposed after the fashion of ordinary respectable households, on being vigorously rung up after one o'clock at night. We were admitted, believed and protected. I have no more to tell.—"

Nor I to add. This is my story. There was indeed a bitter ensuing contest, but that belongs to legal records. Suffice it is that, through all, God's mercy still sustained me, and brought me finally from Death to Life.—N. Y. Citizen.

AN OIL STORY.

SAM BLACK, who owned a snug little farm, was somewhat startled one day by an offer of more than twice the worth of it in greenbacks.

"Shall you sell the farm, Samuel?" asked his wife.

"Certainly I shall," said Sam, "if the fools don't back out, or prove to be a couple of escaped lunatics, as I half suppose them to be." And sell it he did.

After the bargain was made and the money paid, one of the men took Sam and his wife to the back of his garden, where there was a small excavation in the ground filled up by the recent rain.

"See that oil!" said the excited individual, scooping up some of the water in an old tin cup, and holding it up for their inspection.

Sure enough, the oil was half an inch thick on the top of the water.

Sam was indignant. If he hadn't been a fool, as he said to his wife, and just watched for indications, he might have died "worth heaps of money!"

Sam's wife restrained herself, coaxed her husband into the house, and told him the whole story.

"You remember when I had my cough last winter, and the doctor recommended cod-liver oil, Sam, and you brought home a whole gallon, because you got it cheap, and made me promise to take a dose three times a day? Well, I didn't! and it stood in the closet till I cleaned the house, when I threw it all into the hole at the foot of the garden."

Sam saw the joke, and pocketed the cream of it in the shape of a pile of greenbacks.

At last accounts, Sam was living in clover, while the oil hunters were industriously boring—and may be until this time, for all we know.

COFFEE.—The physical effects of coffee are well known; it accelerates the circulation of the blood, but sometimes causes palpitation of the heart and giddiness. It has even been thought to occasion apoplexy and paralysis. Nevertheless, celebrated writers—such as Fontenelle and Voltaire—made constant use of it, almost to an abuse. They were told, it is a slow poison; it was, indeed, slow, for these learned men, who died, one at a hundred, the other at eighty-four years of age. However, at the present time coffee is a beverage whose power over intellectual or moral habit has, perhaps, never been calculated as it deserves, since it has become general, and almost suppressed the drunkenness which disgraced our ancestors at the end of their grand repasts.

GUSTAVE DORE has recently had a large cage of live rats fitted up in his studio, for the purpose of watching the movements of these animals, which will occur more than any other in his new illustrations to the "Fables of La Fontaine," the work he has at present in hand. There are nearly twenty animals in the cage, which has its compartments and sly holes, constructed on purpose that the rat may show his true character.

TWO MILES A MINUTE.—The Duke of Richmond objected to having Goodwood Park disfigured by posts and wires, and, consequently, the telegraph company employed pigeons to convey messages from Goodwood to the telegraph office, at Chichester, during the races. At the recent meeting, thirty pigeons were employed, and the distance, six miles, was flown in about three minutes and a quartor.

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

FALL BONNETS.

IT is quite too early to speak definitely of fall bonnets; nevertheless we judge that there will not be very much change; they will still be permitted to retain their present varied and picturesque forms, though, undoubtedly, the little crowns just set on the top of the head will be relinquished as the cold season advances.

Unfortunately, useless for all practical purposes, as the present style of bonnets are, they are not unbecoming, instead of one fixed and arbitrary shape, there are half a dozen equally fashionable, and ladies can therefore suit their own style of face and feature better than they ever could before.

A very new and stylish hat for early fall wear has a back and front of a square form, and both so much alike that at first sight it is difficult to tell which way it is intended to be worn. It is made of black tulle, with a border of corn colored velvet, worked with small jet beads, and a large Malmaison rose, with jet drops for ornament.

Another, perhaps still more distingue, was made of black gauze drawn into puffings, and ornamented with one large deep-red rose, and three chains formed of coral beads, which passed under the chin, over the gauze strings.

Hats of Tuscan, Italian chip, and Leghorn are being prepared for early fall wear, by trimming them with wreaths composed of small feathers, well curled, and dotted with colored chenille.

Very beautiful chip bonnets are edged with a border of red velvet, covered with white cluny guipure, and ornamented with a bunch of small flame colored feathers.

Bands of black feathers are very pretty, dotted with lily of the valley; these are used as a wreath, and sometimes as a narrow border to the new bonnets.

Gauze veils, attached by some elegant ornament, will undoubtedly be a feature of the fall bonnets.

A corn-colored silk bonnet is coming into style, edged with a narrow quilling of scarlet velvet; bouquet of corn-colored and scarlet flowers. Inside, a Marie Stuart peak of silk, edged with scarlet velvet, falls over the hair, which is arranged in full puffs front and back.

A plain silk bonnet of fall-leaf green is also coming into style, trimmed with a rich green ribbon and a fine branch of brown fern; inside trimming, both front and back, of brown fern and scarlet berries. The veil is fastened at the back of the bonnet.

The Gipsy Queen of puffed white silk, dotted with pearl beads, the edge finished with a festoon trimming of pearls, a double chain of which falls over the back hair.

HOW THE EMPRESS DRESSES.—A correspondent tells: "The journey to Nancy, from which the Empress and her son, the Prince Imperial, returned but recently, was one continuous succession of triumphs for the Imperial lady, and a dazzling display of toilettes for the ladies who had the honor of receiving her Majesty. From Chalons to Nancy, and on her arrival at the station of the latter town, the Empress wore a white muslin dress, covered with the richest Nancy embroidery—an industrial production for which Nancy is celebrated. The embroidery was worked in a straight line above the hem, and again in sprays ascending every breadth of the skirt. The design was exquisitely graceful, bees being very prominent, mingling among the flowers. The bodice, which was high, was trimmed with horizontal lines of the finest guipure insertion. The skirt was worn over a rich white silk petticoat; a wide white silk sash was tied at the back of the waist; a Marie Antoinette scarf, made entirely of fine guipure, and a Lamballe bonnet, covered all over with lilies of the valley and large crystal dew drops, completed her Majesty's toilette. At the Nancy ball, to which more than four thousand people had been invited, the Empress wore a white tulle dress, and a white tulle peplum. The latter fitted the figure, and was adjusted to the waist, with a band of large diamonds; an antique bandeau, consisting entirely of diamonds, encircled the head."

THE NEW HOOPS.—If anything had been required to give the much-abused tilting hoops their death-blow, it would have been found in the mortifying inconvenience to which they have subjected the ladies. A fashion correspondent in Paris, writing on the 20th of July, makes the important announcement that a new style of crinoline has been decided upon in that city, and that although its cut, shape and make up were not generally known at date, the article was being manufactured on a large scale, and would soon appear. It is called cochetraine to some purpose, and, as its name indicates, its hidden or imperceptible in front and on both sides, while a long gored train ending with a frill, affecting the shape of what gentlemen call "the tails" of their dress coats, supports and maintains the trains of the robes behind, where with the help of a string, it raises one's skirts above muddy pavements. It also prevents them from falling in or twisting round the cavalier's legs when they kindly volunteer to offer ladies an arm on trying occasions.

AMUSEMENTS.

MADAME CELESTE'S engagement at the Opera House closed on Tuesday evening with the Green Bushes.

On Wednesday evening Miss Alice Kingsbury, the "Elfin Star," commenced her engagement, and made her first appearance in Fanchon the Cricket. In the character of the wild, hoydenish "Fanchon," who appears in the first act, Miss Alice Kingsbury was startlingly natural and produced a rude romping girl on the stage in a manner which almost frightened those who know what horrid things rude noisy girls are; as they looked at her frolicking round the stage, tossing her long hair off her face with a toss of the head as a rough colt might shake its mane, people forgot that she was acting; but in the second act when the rough "Fanchon" has become softened by love, the impersonation was beautiful. In her interview with "Landry Barbeaud," where he was first beginning to discover that he loved her, nothing could be more delightful than Miss Kingsbury's representation of the coyness of the innocent "Fanchon," her manifestations of love, doubt, hope, and other passions which move the breast of a maiden in love for the first time, were most vividly portrayed, and the audience by bursts of enthusiastic applause, showed their appreciation of the life-like picture. Miss Kingsbury's declamation is not good, but in the impersonation of characters who are only required to speak on the stage as people talk off the stage, but little fault can ever be, we fancy, found with her. She certainly deserves the title of "witching," for she quite captivates her audience and makes them fully enter into the troubles of poor "Fanchon" and rejoice with her in her happiness. Mr. McCullough played "Landry Barbeaud" very well indeed, making many quiet points which brought down the house. Mrs. Harry Jackson had a part which was not quite large enough for her and attempted to make something out of nothing by playing it in tragedy style—she failed, as anyone must have done, in making it interesting. Fanchon has only one good part in it—"Fanchon;" when this part is played by such a charming actress as Miss Alice Kingsbury, the audience desire no more. Having devoted so much space to the play in which Miss Kingsbury made her appearance, we can say but little about the performance on Thursday evening and last night.

On Thursday the house was crowded from pit to dome. The Little Devil and Andy Blake were performed. In the first piece Miss Kingsbury was a most charming "Little Devil," and Mr. McCullough acquitted himself admirably as "Raphael D'Estangue." Some of the other characters were not well played. In the concluding piece, Andy Blake, Miss Kingsbury made an immense hit as the bould Irish boy, and her execution of an Irish jig brought down the house.

Last night Little Barefoot was produced with Miss Kingsbury as "Amri." This afternoon Fanchon the Cricket will be given, and in the evening The Child of the Savanna and The Bonnie Fish Wife will constitute the entertainment.

Edwin Forrest returned to town this week, but immediately set off on a visit to Yo-Semite and the Big Trees. He will leave for the East on the 19th instant, and will probably never again appear on the stage, although he has derived great benefit from the mineral springs of this State.

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.—The gratifying success of La Juive induced the management to repeat it on Monday, Wednesday and Friday evenings of this week, making altogether six representations to well filled houses. The last night, especially, was an overwhelming and enthusiastic tribute to Signor and Signora Bianchi, who selected the occasion for their first benefit during the present season.

This evening the ever welcome Crispino e la Comare will be given for the last time.

On Monday Verdi's Rigoletto, which has been for some weeks in readiness, will be produced; and as the season draws rapidly to a close, we fear that this favorite opera (like Nabuco and La Traviata) will not be given a second time, although it would undoubtedly attract two or three good houses.

On Wednesday evening a rich and varied entertainment will be presented for the benefit of the general director. Mr. J. F. Crowly, whose untiring activity has contributed much to the success of the season. The first and fifth acts of La Juive, comprising much of the most impressive music in the opera, will first be given; followed by the famous music lesson scene from Il Barbiere, in which Signorina Brambilla will introduce "Il Bacio," and Rode's "Air and Variations," while the comical shaving business between Mancusi and Roncovieri will also constitute an attractive feature. The performance will close with the last act of Un Ballo in Maschera, with Miss Jennie Landesmann in the part of the Page, and M'lle Rosa Siegrist—a charming and graceful young artist—in the ballet; the Second Artillery Band, besides their usual appearance in the ball scene, will perform some beautiful selections between the acts; and the talented Siegrist family will also appear in some of their striking gymnastic feats; so that during the whole evening there will be no moment wasted. Mr. Crowley has made up a capital programme, and deserves a good house.

Friday and Saturday nights will be the last of the season, and probably the last of Italian Opera for some time to come. The operas for those evenings are not yet announced.

THE ENGLISH OPERA.—The Howson troupe, at the Metropolitan, gave Fra Diavolo on Tuesday evening and The Bohemian Girl on Thursday; both being very creditably presented with one or two exceptions. In Fra Diavolo Miss Emma Howson made a charming "Zerlina," and Miss Clelia Howson a very characteristic "Lady Allcash." Mr. Frank Howson, Mr. John Howson, and Mr. S. W. Leach were all good: the first as "Lord Allcash," and the last two as the two robbers. Mr. Herberte and Mons. Charles as "Fra Diavolo" and "Lorenzo," sang their parts creditably, but were very inefficient in acting them.

The orchestra and chorus of the Italian troupe give their very efficient aid to the representations of the English Opera company. The Mountain Sylph—for the first time in California—and Cinderella are announced as in preparation.

DR. JORDAN'S ANATOMICAL AND SCIENTIFIC MUSEUM.—The ceroplastic preparations in Anatomy and Pathology, which Dr. Jordan has imported to this country at a great expense, are on exhibition at Eureka Hall daily, from morning until 10 o'clock P. M. Dr. Jordan delivers nightly lectures which are noted for their practical and scientific knowledge.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[THIS department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications:]

WE observe that quite a number of the critics, in noticing Christina Rosetti's poems, speak of them as being pervaded by "a morbid tone." The N. Y. Home Journal thinks that this is especially true with reference to the devotional poems, and attributes the alleged "morbidness" to the influence of "a gloomy ecclesiasticism" upon the poet's mind. Unless the treatment of grave subjects with a certain vein of thoughtful sadness, and a disposition evinced at times by the poet to dwell with steady contemplative earnestness upon mournful themes, are proofs of morbidness, we can find no sufficient ground for the charge. To us, there rather seems evidence of mental disorder in that sensitive shrinking from the contemplation of the more sombre and saddening aspects of life and experience, which characterizes those poets who always write in a vein of optimism calculated to produce the impression that the world is all sunshine and flowers, and that all the people in it are jolly—or else its their own fault.

A reasonable gravitation of the mind toward the great mysteries that encompass, and the great problems that perplex us, and a thoughtful sadness in their contemplation, are proofs of strength rather than feebleness, of health rather than sickness.

The three following pieces are probably the gloomiest that could be selected from the volume; yet, with the exception perhaps of a single stranza in the first, there is not to our apprehension a really morbid strain in either of them:

REST.

I would have gone; God bade me stay:
I would have worked, God bade me rest:
He broke my will from day to day;
He read my yearnings unexpressed,
And said them nay.

Now I would stay; God bids me go:
Now I would rest; God bids me work:
He breaks my heart tossed to and fro,
My soul is wrung with doubts that lurk
And vex it so.

I go, Lord, where Thou seudest me;
Day after day I plod and moil:
But Christ, my God, when will it be
That I may let alone my toil
And rest with Thee?

FOR A DREAM'S SAKE.

The hope I dreamed of was a dream,
Was but a dream; and now I wake
Exceeding comfortless, and worn, and old,
For a dream's sake.

I hang my harp upon a tree,
A weeping willow in a lake:
I hang my silenced harp there, wrung and snapt
For a dream's sake.

Lie still, lie still, my breaking heart;
My silent heart lie still and break;
Life and the world and mine own self are changed
For a dream's sake.

The third is only morbid in the sense in which every sober allusion to what all of us know to be inevitable, and most of us dread, is so:

Underneath the growing grass,
Underneath the living flowers,
Deeper than the sound of showers;
There we shall not count the hours
By the shadows as they pass.

Youth and health will be but vain
Beauty reckoned of no worth:
There a little girth
Can hold round what once the earth
Seemed too narrow to contain.

There is undoubtedly a strain of melancholy in these poems, but is it not a sickly, or a merely sentimental melancholy. It is the result of clear insight, a courageous willingness to look at all things as they are, and a mind too honest and too strong to seek an exemption from disagreeable sensations by ignoring any true aspect of things.

George Eliot's novels are generally very saddening books; but they are not so through any morbid taint in their author If they are not as pleasant reading as Mr. Dickens' delightful coleur de rose pictures of Utopian life and impossible human nature, they are so because her intellect is too powerful and clear-sighted, and her sense of the supreme allegiance due to artistic truth is too profound to permit her to draw human character like a sentimentalist, or to represent human life as if it were all a charming comedy if not a broad farce.

Upon the whole, we think it admits of serious doubt whether those persons are most free from the taint of morbidness, who cannot endure the presence of suffering, and who always look the other way when they pass an undertaker's shop or encounter a funeral.

One would have to look far before he would find among contemporary literature, a poem so original and striking as the following by Mathew Arnold. It embodies a whole system of the Philosophy of Life. It is the poetry, however, not the philosophy that we indorse:

SELF-DEPENDENCE.

Weary of myself, and sick of asking
What I am, and what I ought to be,
At the vessel's prow I stand, which bears me
Forwards, forwards o'er the star-lit sea.

And a look of passionate desire
O'er the sea and to the stars I send:
"Ye, who from my childhood up have calmed me,
Calm me, ah, compose me to the end!"

"Ah, once more," I cried, "ye Stars, ye Waters,
On my heart your mighty charm renew!
Still, still let me, as I gaze upon you,
Feel my soul becoming vast like you!"

From the intense, clear, star-sown vault of heaven,
Over the lit sea's unquiet way,
In the rustling night air came the answer—
"Would'st thou be as these are? Live as they!"

"Unaffrighted by the silence round them,
Undistracted by the sights they see,
These demand not that the things without them
Yield them love, amusement, sympathy."

"And with joy the stars perform their shining,
And the sea its long moon-silvered roll.
For alone they live, nor pine with noting
All the fever of some differing soul."

"Bounded by themselves, and unobservant
In what state God's other works may be,
In their own tasks all their powers pouring,
These attain the mighty life you see." . . .

O, air-born Voice! long since, severely clear,
A cry like thine in my own heart I hear.
"Resolve to be thyself, and know that he Who finds himself loses his misery!"

"POWERFUL" WRITING.

There is no word that is employed so vaguely and at the same time so capriciously in our contemporary criticism, as the word "power." Novels, poems, and essays, are characterized as "powerful" or "weak" upon the most arbitrary principles, and without any trouble being taken either to define the sense in which the writer uses the terms, or to point out the elements of "power" present or lacking in the subject of his criticism. The New York Review says in alluding to this abuse of words:

Here lies the secret of all well-meant but unfair and one-sided criticism—of which there is no lack in the journalism of the period. A critic, for example, whose idea of power in writing is based upon the doctrines of Muscular Christianity, will necessarily glorify the author of "Guy Livingston," and will, as necessarily, disparage the author of "John Halifax." In the former he is refreshed by contact with biceps: in the latter he discovers nothing but a dull narration of effeminate self-denial. The one is powerful; the other is weak. Place the same critic at a theatre, and let him behold Mr. Edwin Forrest ramping and hissing and howling in Shakspeare's Macbeth, and he will be overjoyed at such splendid manifestations of strength. Show him Mr. Booth's Hamlet, and he will find it but a tame and vapid personation, and will wonder at the taste that can approve and relish it. Set before him the great picture of Cæsar lying dead in the senate-house, and, in comparison with almost any battle-piece, or picture of a horse-race, he will find it cold and dull, wanting in vitality and altogether weak. To such a man, a thunderstorm is a better emblem of power than a sunrise—and yet the one is contemptible flurry, in contrast with the massive grandeur and ineffable sublimity of the other. Needless is it to say that the criticism of such a writer, no matter how sincere, is utterly worthless—except in so far as it stimulates beneficial reflection upon the great varieties of mind that are addressed by the artist.

A recent literary item tells us that the author of Felix Holt, the Radical, has left England and temporarily taken up her residence on the Continent, to avoid the temptation of reading contemporary criticism of her novel, and thus to escape the annoyance of learning what Smith, Brown, Jones, Robinson, Tompkins, etc., etc., think of her work and her genius. This piece of information, of course, does not proceed from Miss Evans herself. It is given out by a newspaper gossip, and is as likely to be false as it is to be true. If, however, Miss Evans really has fled from the critics, she has acted wisely. They, certainly, can teach her nothing; and while their praise might be grateful, their censure could not but wound a sensitive spirit. If vanity misses a little pleasure, sensibility avoids great pain. Nor is the avoidance of criticism—as will be said in many quarters—a sign of weakness. There is no writer living who, in the absolutely true sense of the word, possesses power, in a greater degree than Marion Evans; and, if she declines to listen to criticism, it is only because she perfectly well appreciates the rarity of large-thoughted, comprehensive, delicate appreciation.

THE NEW TEMPLE.

SEE! mighty Babel rise,
High, towering to the skies
On Shinar's plain!
So superstition's throne,
With thousand tongues unknown,
Has bid the nation own
Oppression's reign.

Here, we a temple raise,
On truth's eternal base
To Liberty!
A temple whose fair dome
Shall point the nation's home:
Whose motto bids them come—
"Here, all are free!"

Oppressor and oppressed
Seeking one common rest,
Shall hither come.
Loud let your heralds ring,
'Till bond and free shall sing,
'Till the last wanderer bring
His tribute home.

'Till fell oppression fled,
Skulks, with the craven dead,
In grim repose;
Fair freedom lifts the veil—
Hail Liberty! All hail!
Mighty thou shalt prevail
O'er all thy foes.

And in this temple fair,
Which we to God uprear,
The praise shall be
The never ceasing song
Of the enfranchised throng,
Borne all the earth along—
"Here, all are free!"

Now let us strike the lyre
In strains yet clearer, higher,
To Liberty!
Sing, universal good,
Sing, the great brotherhood—
Shout, over hill and flood,
Our Land is free!

CORRESPONDENCE.

ART AND ARTISTS IN SAN FRANCISCO.

To the Editor of the Californian:

SIR:—"J. S. B." in his correspondence on "Art" in last week's CALIFORNIAN, is inclined to be rather severe on those of our artists who "forget their art in the love of money." I think that "J. S. B." can hardly have reflected upon all the trials that an artist must have to encounter in this materialistic country. The artist must live, and in order to do so he is obliged to sell his pictures at the valuation of such persons as may have the means to furnish fine parlors, who are very seldom those of any cultivation, or even natural refinement. "Money" is the only God that most wealthy Californians know, and all who have had to labor in any of those fields not designed to supply material wants, can bear testimony to how grudgingly the most trifling pittance is doled out to them. Indeed I believe it quite impossible for a person of either sex to make more than the barest means of existence, and that by the closest application in any business calling for cultivation, refinement, or genius, unless aided by some factitious deputation or circumstance. The artist can hardly be said to have forgot his art in the love of money, when in order to secure a bare existence he is obliged to sacrifice all his hopes and tastes, and spend the time and energy that he would gladly devote to the study and advancement of his art in work that has become to him mere druggery. All the artists whose names have become household words, have possessed the means of living independent of their art, or have had wealthy patrons and appreciative friends. Where in this country is the artist to look for what in any sense could be called patronage, much less for that appreciation of genius which is ever needed to give to it its brightest coloring? How, we would ask, Mr. Editor, is it with literature? Does it pay so well as to place the writer above the drudge and thus give time and inspiration for the loftier flights? How with the "poets," do they reap a golden harvest? Are they any better off than the artists?

Respectfully, M. B. S.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 11, 1866.

PUBLIC PARKS AND GARDENS.

To the Editor of the Californian:

During the first years of the settlement of any new country the population devote their whole energies to making money. They till the soil sufficiently to make it produce food; they build houses which will serve them as shelters; but they have no time to do more than this. In course of time fortunes are accumulated, and some of those who have devoted the earlier years of their lives to acquiring money, begin to slacken in their efforts to add to that which they already have, and think rather how they can make their wealth conduce to their comfort. Too many have, by the time they have acquired what they consider a fortune, lost the faculty of enjoying the good things of life which money would enable them to procure. The subject of laying out a public park in San Francisco for the benefit of its citizens is agitated at present. This community is now certainly old enough and wealthy enough to afford this luxury, and it is to be hoped we shall very shortly see steps taken to secure it. In the meantime it is to be regretted that there are many men of wealth in San Francisco who appear to take no interest in beautifying their homes. To such, the action taken by R. B. Woodward Esq., is a standing reproof. He has, by a liberal outlay of money, turned the sandy desert, which formerly surrounded his house, into beautiful gardens. This undertaking, which was at first commenced to gratify the taste of an individual, has now become a public benefit. Woodward's Gardens, on Mission and Valencia streets, now form our most pleasant suburban resort. Experienced landscape gardeners have laid out these grounds with consummate taste. A winding walk embowered in shrubs, leads to the top of a slight eminence, from whence one can enjoy a beautiful view. Beneath is a miniature lake on which float black swans and other rare aquatic birds. Fine conservatories have been built which contain choice tropical plants. The art gallery is filled with pictures from the brush of many a native born artist, as well as a collection which the proprietor formed during his tour through Europe. In different parts of the garden are to be seen curious animals, well cared for in comfortable cages, and almost tame enough to be allowed to roam at large.

In creating this little paradise, Mr. Woodward has spent his money well—has done far better with it than if he had allowed it to remain accumulating interest. He has made the citizens of San Francisco a delightful garden where they can wander about perfectly undisturbed, free from the noise and other disagrémens to be found in public gardens whose entrance is through a drinking saloon, and which were formed for merely speculative purposes. No liquor is sold at these gardens, and the fee charged for admission is less than that generally given to an English nobleman's servant for conducting you through the picture gallery. Every fine afternoon ladies and children may be seen strolling through these gardens, learning the names of rare trees and shrubs, all of which have tickets attached to them. It is worth the while of the denizen of this sandy city to pay a visit to this beautiful spot if only to refresh his eyes with the sight of a broad expanse of green grass. Long may Woodward's Gardens—the result of the promptings of a cultivated and refined mind—remain open to the public, and may others like them shortly be formed in the vicinity of the city, with owners like Mr. Woodward, liberal enough to throw open them to the public, as are many of the private parks of England to be enjoyed as much by those who own neither houses nor lands, as by those who, blessed with wealth, have put it to so good a purpose.

MORE ABOUT ART.

To the Editor of the Californian:

Your editorial answer to your correspondent "J. S. B." gives the true state of art affairs in San Francisco. Paintings of value and merit have been brought here and sacrificed at a tithe of their value. The artist who would sit down in San Francisco to paint for fame, sadly mistakes his location. Even the few who discourse the most glibly on pictures seem to know but little of our local artists, for I see your correspondent "Astræa" errs in several of his art items. He says "Denny, our only marine artist, seems to be idle, for we have seen nothing from his hand for a long time." How blind "Astræa" must be. Denny, Bush, Hill and Marple had several good pictures in the recent catalogue sale of of paintings by Duncan & Co., and they were sold for a trifle over the cost of frames and canvass; while some flaring New York copies of Eastern scenes were eagerly purchased! Denny's pictures, in that sale, were particularly noteworthy, and on the Atlantic side would have brought remunerative prices. Bush, who is rapidly improving, had some charming little studies on the Sacramento which sold, "frames and all," for the alarming price of ten dollars! Marple's "Yo-Semite Falls, "Fallen Leaf Lake," "North Fork of Carson," and "Sentinel Rock," four really good pictures, were disposed of at $31, $31, $45 and $45. Hill, who has an established reputation, fared no better—two of his large paintings selling for $40 and $42. Denny's spirited marine views reached the amazing sum of $27. When it will be recollected that these were all richly framed at California prices, the margin left to the artist may be imagined but could hardly be fingered.

"Give us good pictures" forsooth, why it is not a twelvemonth since the works of Peale, May, Rochermel, Lang, Somers, and others, were sold at auction for paltry sums, ranging from $40 to $80, although soon afterward the glaring red white and blue affairs of Butman brought fabulous sums. So runs the public taste, and as I have no wish to engage in the fruitless task of correcting it I will close. **

To the Editor of the Californian:

Within the last two months I have noted inquiries addressed to no less than three literary papers inquiring what poet Tennyson alluded to in the lines from "In Memoriam:"

"I hold it clear with him who sings
To one clear harp of divers tones
That men may rise on stepping stones
Of their dead selves, to higher things."

Each of the journals so addressed furnished an answer differing from that of the others. One thought that Goethe was referred, a second named Dante, and the third it was David. Now unless I am much mistaken all these opinions are erroneous. I have a distinct recollection of a passage in Wordsworth, though I cannot now recall it, the purport of which is precisely that of the lines quoted, while even the expression is nearly the same. Longfellow's "Builders," also gives very distinct expression to the same thoughts. I have no doubt that Wordsworth is the poet referred to by Mr. Tennyson. V. K. V.

NEW "THINGS" IN JEWELRY.—Small humming-birds are now mounted for ornaments, and the ingenious adaptation of these gay plumaged denizens of warmer and sunnier climes, to brooches, ect., deserves to meet with success. Small gold beaks are added to the birds, likewise pearl or ruby eyes, and the bird is set in dead gold, chased more or less richly. I have seen an intire set of these humming-bird ornaments—ear rings, brooch, and comb. On the comb there were five small heads, each with a gold beak, and they sparkled like precious stones. Ear-rings are also made in enamel, to represent a dragon-fly, the wings being diapered blue and gold; a peacock, represented in enamel, also makes a most dazzling motif for both a comb and brooch. But the most original ear-rings which have come under my notice, are banners of sky-blue and white enamel, studded with very small brilliants, and fringed with gold. Ear-rings are made even larger than they were during the spring; they are most exaggerated in size and style."

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST.

"MEDICINE CHESTS always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents.

Doctor Chapman, who dislikes French medical works, speaking of a translation, says: "The Frenchman lies first, and then the translation relies on him."

"EXPERIENCE IS THE GREAT TEACHER."—So it is. Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, has had about twenty-five years of it in the curing of disease without medicines, bleeding, blistering, or plastering, and does what few other doctors do-guarantees the promises he makes, because he knows what he can do. *

Boerhave calls the "regular" physician "a fortunate man if positively he injures not his patient."

UNDERSTANDING—The nature of disease so well, from long experience. Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, guarantees cures in almost all cases, if so agreed, but especially in Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Fever and Ague, Dropsy, etc. *

Hoffman writes "few are the remedies whose virtues and operations are certain; many are those which are doubtful, suspicious, fallacious, false."

THE PACIFIC HYGEIAN HOME.—This association commence business at their city headquarters No. 627, Sacramento street, between Montgomery and Kearny, to-day. They have fitted up in connection with their business office an elegant Lecture Hall, furnished with a large collection of paintings, drawings, busts, skulls and pathological charts, where free lectures will be given every Tuesday and Saturday evenings on the preservation of Health, the treatment of diseases, Temperance, Phrenology, Physiognomy and Physiology. There is also a bathing department attached, for the application of medical baths of various varieties; and a Gymnasium with all the necessary appliances for proper exercises. The association have also made many improvements in the buildings at their home for invalids, "Fountain Farm," located about four miles from Oakland, on the Telegraph road to Martinez. The Home is situated on a beautiful rise of ground, just at the mouth of a canon, at an elevation of about 400 feet; from which may be obtained a splendid view of the valley of Alameda, the bay and city of San Francisco, and the Golden Gate. The "Home" is located with especial regard to its climatic and sanitary advantages for invalids. *

THE ELDER BOOTH—HIS ECCENTRICITIES.

BY ISAAC C. PRAY.

THEY who watched the career of Junius Brutus Booth, which fairly commenced in England in 1815, but in this country, at Norfolk, Virginia, on the 30th of June, 1821, will be surprised at the poverty in incidents and facts of Mrs. Clarke's biography of him.* It is not credible that such a man as Mr. Booth should have left so little on record, and we are quite confident that a much more interesting and valuable biography might be written. The purpose of this work, as actually executed, and whatever the intention of the writer may have been, appears to be not so much to give to the public a complete insight into the life and genius of the elder Booth, as to sustain a natural family pride, grievously shocked by a recent deplorable national calamity. Mrs. Clarke's purpose to protect the family name from the imputation of bloodthirstiness, by showing how all the gentle elements were mingled in the daily life and being of the elder Booth, is sufficiently commendable in a daughter and sister; but as this has been done at the expense of the great actor, who really merits a better and sterner biographer, we must regret this publication. In itself it is well enough, but for the public and for the drama, we wish that something more had been attempted, and that more had been accomplished. Men who fill a large space in the public eye are sometimes unaware that there are watchers on the towers of society who note their outgoings and their incomings, and who can give records with startling minuteness, which will prove lessons to individuals and to mankind. Mr. Booth's history is better known, we think, to individuals who had only a natural public interest in his talents and career, than even to his daughter. At least, she has failed to present more than a meagre record of what the brilliant tragedian accomplished. Lost to himself, to his art, and to society, as were many of Mr. Booth's days, squandered in vagrant wastefulness, yet he was so industrious, so ambitious, and so faithful a devotee of the magnificent yet too often desecrated art which he frequently exalted, and almost always adorned, that it will be pitiful if no better record of him can be transmitted to posterity.

We agree with Mrs. Clarke in all she says of Mr. Booth's love of mankind, and of his regard for religions and creeds; but we do not consider that there is any merit in making the history of a professional man chiefly remarkable for demonstrating that he was something else than what the world took him to be, or he himself publicly professed to be. It is with the elder Booth as an actor, principally, that we would become familiar. What his theological views may have been, or his theories on farming, or on any other subjects, further than as they serve to give the keys to his character, we do not care to know. Such records, no doubt, belong to the career of the man, but the most important part of his life was his dramatic life; all the written or oral testimony on this subject would have been welcome.

Let us come now to Mrs. Clarke's treatment of that portion of her subject which pertains to the eccentricities of Mr. Booth. Here she leaves the reader to conjecture much more than the truth permits, and leaves upon record no statement to meet the charge usually made, that Mr. Booth was a habitual drinker of ardent spirits. While he was alive nothing was more common than to attribute every one of his eccentricities to the influence of strong potations. Mrs. Clarke assigns to domestic afflictions at certain times some of his peculiarities, and truth entitles her to do so; but she does not meet the subject fairly and dispose of it fully. Probably she has not the power to do so; but happily we have the data to enable us to settle, with some degree of certainty, the conflicting opinions on the subject into a solid basis of truth. Personal observation permits us to bear testimony on the subject.

In Boston, at the Tremont Theatre, during the stage management of Mr. William H. Smith, Mr. Booth was announced to follow a short season of comedy, by performing in some of his most effective tragic plays. Evadne was selected for the first performance. The house was crowded. At the precise moment when "Ludovico" should enter, Mr. Booth promptly appeared, and the immense audience gave him "an immense reception." He did not heed the plaudits, but moved forward, and turning abruptly up the stage, found on a door a knocker. It had been used the night before in a comedy. This noisy property seemed at the moment more important to Mr. Booth than the play of Evadne, or the people who had come to witness it. He seized it and gave it a London gentleman's well-known rat-tat-tat, surprising every one familiar with the scene upon which he had entered. A pause ensued. Then Mr. Booth came towards the footlights and said, with imperturbable coolness: "Ladies and gentlemen, it appears that there is nobody at home!" Murmurs filled the house, which were soon turned into a general conversation, as the stage manager came forward and seized Mr. Booth by the collar. The tragedian was taken from the stage. What ensued behind the scenes has never been publicly stated. Mr. Smith took Mr. Booth into the green-room, and told him that he would punish him severely if he did not proceed with the business of the evening. The threat had a good effect. The curtain was taken up a second time, and Mr. Booth again appeared. No one who was present that evening will forget the brilliant manner in which Mr. Booth performed "Ludovico." We doubt if he ever surpassed that personation. The character was sustained without the slightest flaw or speck, and such was the brilliancy of the performance that the whole audience, particularly during the last act, held spell-bound by the great actor's art, remained in mute and breathless admiration of the scene. Had not Mr. Booth been persuaded to personate "Ludovico" on the evening to which we have referred, it might have been said that he was intoxicated, as was frequently said when he exhibited similar aberrations of mind. The perfection of his acting showed that he was under no alcoholic influence, for no man can place himself before the public upon the stage, even in a slightly intoxicated condition, without being betrayed by his eyes, if not by his general appearance.

Another occurrence of the like nature took place at the Chatham street theatre, under Mr. Charles Thorne's management, in 1839. Mr. Booth exhibited at that time such an indifference in the opening scenes of Othello that he was hissed most emphatically. He resented the treatment by beginning to act in his best manner from the close of the Senate scene till the end of the play. During that engagement he drank neither wine nor spirits, but he smoked cigars constantly and with a bad result, for he was unable to remember the text of "Richard III.," and frequently called to the prompter for the "word."

Doubtless, Mr. Booth's eccentricities were increased and made glaring occasionally by the use of spirits. Indeed, we know that this was so, for there are witnesses to the fact that he frequently visiten bar-rooms, and wandered from saloon to saloon, wasting his time and exciting pity for the desecration of his talents and opportunities. We would be be charitable, however, and not cast censure on this unfortunate actor, whose example has had a very deleterious effect upon some of the most gifted young men of this country—hurrying them into their graves, and casting upon their splendid profession stigmas only to be effaced by the virtues of those who shall follow them.

It may be regarded as certain that Mr. Booth was, at times, subject to insanity. The evidences of it were given from year to year during his theatrical life, from 1821 down to the year of his death, and of these testimonies a few have been retained in Mrs. Clarke's volume. One of the painful histories is that which was originally furnished by the Rev. James Freeman Clarke, for the Boston Pearl, in 1834, and a later edition of which was published in the Atlantic Monthly of last year, its author having somewhat enlarged the narrative at first made public. No one can read the story without being satisfied that Mr. Booth was subject to fits of temporary aberation of mind, which, though usually harmless, were apt to be made severe and dangerous when stimulated by alcohol. There was, however, more to be feared from the constitutional weakness of Mr. Booth than from the agency of the liquor, for it does not appear that he had any fixed habit that made him a slave to the vice of drinking.

Mr. Booth's education was of a high order to a certain extent, but it was not a profound one. As a linguist, he was in advance of the best men in his profession, as was demonstrated in New Orleans, where he personated one of Talma's parts and other characters, speaking the French language. On our stage few persons can speak their own tongue with propriety, and not one in a hundred of the actors of to-day know the difference between blank verse and prose. They usually speak of the mysteries of verse as of some great mountain to be passed over, or as a dangerous lion in the pathway.

Mr. Booth was of the old school of English actors, with whom education was a paramount consideration, as it is now again becoming in Great Britain; barristers, clergymen and physicians, according to report, during the present year having adopted the theatrical profession as preferable to the pursuits for which they were originally designed. Mr. Booth, in this respect, always commanded the admiration of scholars. He never filled an engagement in any city without drawing around him the most learned and cultivated men in this country; and many of those who have held the highest places at the bar, in the senate and in the pulpit, caught much of the spirit of eloquence from the glowing and spirited style of this great actor.

Mr. Booth was a man of marked dramatic genius in the interpretation of character. When he began to depict Iago, for instance, he came upon the stage with the spirit of a man who knew nothing outside of the scene in which he was taking part. His small figure, balanced rather unsteadily on high-heeled boots, rocked with the intensity of his earnestness, and he began his dialogue with a strong, metallic voice, which, when used in violent passages, gained something in power by its nasal tones, although these had sometimes a disagreeble effect on the auditor. As the play proceeded, he showed still more earnestness of manner, every word and phrase being uttered as if then for the first time moulded into expression by the speaker himself. The eyes had their part to do at the same time. Mr. Booth never looked beyond the footlights to see how few or how many persons were before him. He looked chiefly at the interlocutors upon the stage, and he kept them also to the business of the scene, by making them understand that they were there for the special and only purpose of doing something which the poet had designed to produce a positive effect. His gestures were not elegant. They were angular, but they were from the soul; and his arms and hands quivered with emotion as he gave expression to his feelings. When he gave way entirely to the passion of the scene, the audience was excited to the most breathless attention, and many auditors seized their neighbors with an involuntary grasp that was not relinquished till the actor left the stage. Such was the magnetism of his acting that actors and audience shared alike in the excitement. The secret of his power was in his intensity and earnestness. He felt all that he said, and he was in action always, because that was the purpose of his art. As Pescara, he was fearfully grand and terribly sublime in the portraiture of villainy. As Iago, he was subtle, saturnine, humorous, serpent-like and devilish, without any apparent conscience or a single moral inspiration. He had not what is represented as the oily smoothness and sleek suavity of Charles Young, but he seemed an embodiment of the wicked man of the world, moved and inspired only by selfishness. As Ludovico, he was exceedingly brilliant, and his style glittered like the rapier which in the last act he doubled under him in his death throe, thrilling every beholder with the reality of the catastrophe. In the abominable stage version of one of Shakspeare's best plays, Richard III., he was very popular, because in that histrionic exhibition he combined all the elements of his acting. It was, however, the least attractive character in which he appeared, to those whose taste was elevated above that melo-dramatic version. As Bertram and Sir Giles Overreach, he was grand in exciting terror and exhibiting the frightful picture of a human soul wrecked by remorse and wickedness.

We may await the appearance of another actor like Mr. Booth the elder, not without hope. Mr. Edwin Booth, his son, has displayed in Iago remarkably strong claims to the highest distinction. He is, however, apt to flag in the last acts of his performances, and has scarcely the intensity of earnestness that made his father so renowned in this country.

THE MANNERS OF NAPOLEON AND EUGINIE.—The Empress is impulsive, very kind, and has a smile that would be really sweet and charming in any women, and that, naturally, loses none of its charm by showing itself in the face of an empress to a world, still weakly partial to "majesty." The charm of the Emperor's smile is, in its way, just as effective, its power being often acknowledged even by those who detest him the most cordially, as in the case of M. Prevost-Paradol, one of his bitterest political opponents, who, having been received by the Emperor, as is the custom here, after his recent reception into the Academy, on which occasion he had crammed his discourse with ingeniously yet transparantly covered allusions to the Emperor of the most bittingly malicious character, and, being questioned shortly afterwards by a friend as to the impression made upon him by the interview, could not avoid expressing his sense of the charm of the Emperor's manner, and added, quoting a well known French proverb, "The fact is, mon cher, that in order thoroughly to hate people, one should not see them too near."

ABSTINENCE OF ROMAN WOMEN.—The ancient Romans, in some respects, were in advance of the present age in their practical physiological knowledge. This was specially the case in the habits of the women. They seemed to be fully aware of the fact that a hardy race must be born of healthful mothers, and consequently any usage or practice likely to affect injuriously the health of women, was viewed by the State with suspicion. The muscles were systematically educated. Frequent bathing was required by law. Large bath houses were established, which were places of common resort. For several centuries of the best ages of Rome it was a criminal offence for a Roman mother to drink intoxicating liquors. At the time of the labors of our Saviour on earth, and for a long period after, it was considered infamous for a Roman to taste of wine. For a guest to offer a glass of wine to one of the women of the household was looked upon as a deep insult, as it implied a want of chastity on her part.

KISSING—A PROSE POEM.—A genuine, hearty, honest kiss is made up of everything that is good. It smacks of truth, of sensibility, of delicate sentiment, of genial susceptibilities, of strong natural sympathies, of ingenious devotion, of preference, of taste, of feeling, of an ardent yet artless nature, at once bashful and tender, willing to be won, needing the winning, yet yielding reluctantly by the natural law that makes coyness a sweet restraint on wooing, stimulating even when it darts away in flight. The first kiss is the down upon the peach, the opening of the rosebud, the blossom of the dawn, the one star of the night, the delight that makes all the future life a dream of the Elysium, and hallows the home of memory.

CORN-FLOWERS.

FROM dawn till dusk, we followed up
The reapers through the wheat;
And tied the rustling corn, that lay
Like sunshine at our feet.

Kate laughed with Willio all day long,
And Kate sang merrily;
He said she sang like any bird,
And then she laughed to me.

For Kate he reaped the poppies red
That nodded in the corn;
For me he broke a pale sweet rose,
And pulled away the thorn.

He said the flowers were like her cheek,
My heart was sore all day;
And when he held the rose to me,
I turned my face away.

The blue shades fell; and by the stile
At dusk we sat to rest;
Through tears, I watched the angels' wings
That flickered in the west.

They gossiped; and I heard them say,
"O, she is never seen
When Kate is near! She's slight and pale;
And Kate is like a queen."

And they went gayly by the fields;
And I, to hide my pain,
Slipped from them at the dusky stile,
And went home by the lane.

I heard his step—I would not stay—
And when he came so near
I felt him breathe, I would not look,
And dried a silly tear.

Then bitterly he spoke. He held
The rose I would not wear;
And I said, "Give it Kate; she twined
The poppies in her hair!"

"O, hear me now, below the moon
That watches from above!
I jest with merry Kate," he said,
"But never speak of love.

"And what is Kate between us two?
I love but you alone;
O, take the sign, and take my heart,
Since, love, it is your own!"

I took the rose. A little bird
Sang out a song for me;
And broadly smiled the harvest moon,
Our happy looks to see.

SICK—AND THEOPHILUS PETS ME.

"THERE are sufferings that take no shape, and have no name"—not a monopoly, however, for there remain griefs, annoyances, and temper trials sufficient to keep us all from mistaking this world for the next.

I should like to call a convention of married women to-night, to tell their experiences of sickness. In the first place, no woman has a right to be sick. She has not time. It is a state of "masterly inactivity," belonging under the head masculine.

But I do wonder if ever any other woman than myself was ill, and had her husband for her nurse! If there has been, that woman knows something about a suffering that has a "shape," and a beard, probably; wears boots, and, no doubt, uses tobacco.

I once so far forgot my high calling, as to be ill—not dangerously, but distressfully ill—in that womanly way that cries softly for pettings, caresses, and honey-moon adjectives.

I trust a kind Providence will never suggest a second volume.

Being ill, as I say, I entreated my Theophilus to stay at home.

And he did, one day.

The fact is, confidentially—no sooner had my entreaties prevailed, that he should stay in doors, and pet me, all-day-long, than I began to conjecture, then to fear; afterwards—well wait!

Imagine my carefully darkened room; myself in bed, in my prettiest "white things"—one bright rose-colored ribbon to enliven—looking pale, interesting, and, as I believed, not unpretty; when in comes Theophilus.

Now, my Theophilus is not one of the "feather weights"—that is, not strictly. He weighs two hundred pounds, and wears heavy boots. In he comes, I say, everything shakes and quivers.

Whir-r-r—whir-r-r. Bang! bang! And open fly my four great windows!

I wink, and blink, and cover my eyes, when he exclaims in such a voice, that I think he is calling to the man on the roof of the next house. "Fresh air, plenty of light, nothing like it for recovery! Come old lady! come, Clementina! Let's get you up!"

Of course, though I quiver like a jelly, I get up, for hasn't Theophilus stayed at home on purpose to pet me?

But no sooner am I up than he says:

"Come, old lady! come, Clementina! up long enough; let's get you to bed."

Of course, back to bed I go.

Now, there's one little thing that every woman knows. If there are chairs in your room sufficient far a funeral, a man will plant himself right on the bed. And so down sat Theophilus on my bed.

"Oh—my feet!" cried I.

"Your feet!" says Theophilus, "who supposed your feet were there?"

Now, if he would only sit still! not he! He keeps rushing in and out of the next room. He keeps jumping up and looking out of the window. Do I suppose he is looking for somebody? Not I! I only trust there is nobody beneath, and, Heaven grant, Bridget hasn't set out a custard to cool!

By-and-by this good heart says:

"Come, hurra boys! let's give the old lady some lunch." I plead in my now really exhausted state for—"only a bite, dear."

"Certainly," he says, "only a bite, but you must eat or you'll never be well."

Out he goes, proceeding down the stairs. I then remember that he hasn't kissed me once all day! I cry myself to sleep, and just as I am in the most soothing doze, I hear a distant tramp, tramp, tramp.

Half awakened, I think of Southern invasion—President Lincoln—habeas corpus—and that we are every one of us prisoners.

But, happily, no! it is a peaceful procession bearing—"the wing of a bird," or "dipped toast."

Don't interrupt me! Wait!

First, comes my Theophilus bearing tray No. 1. On it, a large tea-pot, a pitcher of hot water, a tankard of milk sufficient for all the unweaned babies in New England, and about two pounds of sugar.

Of course he put his tray on the foot of my bed, and, my feet being slightly irregular in surface, over goes the tea-pot, the milk and sugar mingle just as they should, and all together mingle with me.

But the triumphal procession moves on. Bridget, bearing tray No. 2, on which is a large steak, two lamb chops, ham, eggs, and a large plate of pancakes.

Tray No. 3 is borne by my first born little Theophy, with fried hominy, mashed potatoes, shaved cabbage, and a small cauliflower, of which my good husband remembers I am fond.

A small wretch, belonging to a neighbor, brings up the rear, (which I long to attack, full flank,) with a tray of quince preserves, sardines, with a lemon, a small plate of pickled onions, and—oh! shade of Esculapius!—a sausage!

How do you suppose I feel, for certainly I am "speechless;" and to be "bound hand and foot, and cast ont," I think just at this time I might enjoy as a joke.

As I prudently feign sleep, they all tip-toe out. Tip-toe? Imagine it!

Theophilus in heavy boots—weight, two hundred pounds. Bridget, in brogans fit for a bog, weight, one hundred and ninety-four pounds. Theophy, school shoes and dirt, weight, ninety-six pounds, and ungodly little wretch—wish I had you here this minute—weight, say, twenty-two pounds.

There! Imagine that, on tip-toe! Why it makes me think of the noise of the rats that crossed the Rhine and ate up Bishop Hatto.

Imagine how much of that lunch I wanted. But the climax has not yet come.

My bureau, my table, my mantel are covered by bottles, boxes, washes, and lotions, of an infinite and expensive variety.

Everything denotes a serious illness. Here I lie, apparently very ill, and there that lunch lies—making me out the most horrible of liars, and a monster of malignant appetite.

Now comes the "pretty" part of all this. (Oh Theophilus!) As they have all gone, I think I will get up softly, and hold on by the chairs and table—just taste—one onion. (I am so very fond of pickled onions, you see!) While I am thus absorbed, (they do taste good!) I hear a creak, creak, creak, on the stairs—well, just such a creak as you can't buy except in a pair of doctor's boots, and lo! before I can jump, leap, or fly back into bed, there—right in the door, stands Dr. Pilbocks.

There! now, you've got the "pretty" part—the situation.

The doctor, who always wears a "dog-wont-eat-dog" expression of face anyway, looks at me—looks at the lunch. He looks again—again—once more. (I forget now where I looked.) Then he says gently—gently, did I say? Well, it was that kind of gently that is so sharp and cuts so deep that you don't feel it till you're killed—yes, gently and very slowly he says:—"Mrs. Theophilus Tuddiwinks, I am very glad to find you so free from pain, and as I am very busy, unless you are sensibly worse, I will not call again at present."

He goes. Time he did.

Onions always did make my eyes "water;" I never, never, will ask Theophilus Tuddiwinks to stay from business again to pet me.—New York Home Journal.

THE SOURCES OF THE NILE.

[The following is extracted from the story of the perilous journeyings of those intrepid explorers, Mr. and Mrs. Baker, who discovered the mountain sources of the Nile. The work has just been published by Macmillan, of London:]

THE sun had not risen when I was spurring my ox after the guide, who, having been promised a double handful of beads on arrival at the lake, had caught the enthusiasm of the moment. The day broke beautifully clear, and, having crossed a deep valley between the hills, we toiled up the opposite slope. I hurried to the summit. The glory of our prize burst suddenly upon me! There, like a sea of quicksilver, lay far beneath the grand expanse of water—a boundless sea-horizon on the south and southwest, glittering in the noon-day sun; and on the west, at fifty or sixty miles' distance, blue mountains rose from the bosom of the lake to a height of about seven thousand feet above its level. It is impossible to describe the triumph of that moment—here was the reward for all our labor—for the years of tenacity with which we had toiled through Africa. England had won the sources of the Nile! Long before I reached this spot, I had arranged to give three cheers with all our men in English style, in honor of the discovery; but, now that I looked down upon the great inland sea, lying nestled in the very heart of Africa, and thought how vainly mankind had sought these sources throughout so many ages, and reflected that I had been the humble instrument permitted to unravel this portion of the great mystery, when so many greater than I had failed, I felt too serious to vent my feelings in vain cheers for victory, and I sincerely thanked God for having guided and supported us through all dangers to the good end. I was about fifteen hundred feet above the lake, and I looked down from the steep granite cliff upon those welcome waters—upon that vast reservoir which nourished Egypt and brought fertility where all was wilderness—upon that great source so long hidden from mankind; that source of bounty and of blessings to millions of human beings; and, as one of the greatest objects in nature, I determined to honor it with a great name. As an imperishable memorial of one loved and mourned by our gracious Queen and deplored by every Englishman, I called this great lake "the Albert N'yanza." The Victoria and the Albert lakes are the two sources of the Nile. The zigzag path to descend to the lake was so steep and dangerous, that we were forced to leave our oxen with a guide, who was to take them to Magungo, and wait for our arrival. We commenced the descent of the steep pass on foot. I led the way, grasping a stout bamboo. My wife, in extreme weakness, tottered down the pass, supporting herself upon my shoulder, and stopping to rest every twenty paces.—Baker's Sources of the Nile.

SEA-BATHING SCENES.

THE tide is well in, and the fun has commenced. Zephyr, the bathing man, paddles a boat, to which is fastened a flight of wooden steps for the bathers to rest upon, to and fro at a distance of a few yards from the shore; while the young Zephyr plunges clad into the water, assisting the confident and encouraging the timid. Two tender creatures float on their backs close to his boat; and yonder, two or three hundred feet from the beach, three pretty faces float hither and thither, rosy with the kisses of the amorous waves. Mark that troop of ocean sylph stripping down over the shingle. Large, light cloaks conceal their fair forms, but as they reach the edge of the sea, they fling their cloaks away, and appear attired in fantastically ornamented jackets and loose pantaloons. Then, with a ringing laugh, into the sea they plunge, scattering the bright water around them, and swim seaward, brightening the water as they go like a troop of Nereides. Maidens of the brine, they put to shame yonder shivering fellow, who crawls into the water, knee-deep, and shivers through every limb. The sun strikes on their faces, glorifying the golden hair of the beauty who takes the lead. They are quite at home in the water. It is an odious comparison, but they swim as finely as frogs, playing all kinds of antics as they speed along.

Yonder is an angel rolling over and over like a porpoise. See, now, they all join hands and float silently side by side upon the water, till, with a silvery burst of laughter, they dash the foam from their faces, and swim onward.

O, to have an hour's marine flirtation with the golden-haired child of Thetis!

That flirtations do take place under such circumstances, I have heard on the best authority.

It is reported that one young gentleman, who swam indifferently, followed out into the sea a young lady, who swam excellently; that, panting with emotion and exertion, he assured her in the briefest possible manner of his attachment and almost choked himself in the attempt to seize and kiss her hand; that, floating upon his back, he explained quietly his position and circumstances, and breathed words of tenderness, while the fair one again and again plunged under water to conceal her blushes; and that, finally, when they swam to shore, the daring youth had been accepted, at the cost of being almost paralyzed with cold.

"L. S. D. L," and several other contributions filed for insertion, have been crowded out of this issue.

THE GROWTH OF CULTURE.

THE letter of our correspondent, "J. S. B.," in last week's CALIFORNIAN, on the condition of art in San Francisco, has elicited quite a number of communications in reply, two of which we publish. The burden of all is the same—the lack of genuine appreciation of art in the community, and the niggardly spirit with reference to it, manifested by the great majority of the class possessing the means of affording it substantial encouragement. All partake more or less of the vein of a Jeremiad, though in a few the tone of angry objurgation swells above that of doleful complaint, and our wealthy people are vigorously scolded because they do not care for, or will not buy fine pictures. This strain is idle if not unreasonable. Culture and taste are excellent things; but there are other things more necessary, and that will always possess an overshadowing influence in young communities. Man must make his habitation comfortable before he can give much serious attention to the task of making it beautiful. While a young colony is busy in cutting down forests, building roads, developing mines, establishing manufactures, in short, until the whole of what may be fairly embraced in "the period of settlement" is passed, a materialistic spirit must necessarily prevail. In a city not yet twenty years old, and a community still mainly occupied in adjusting itself to new conditions, where the social fabric has but begun to settle into shape, it seems scarcely reasonable to look for much high appreciation of the more delicate products of the intellect or the imagination. It has been maintained, too, that true artistic taste is far rarer than talent; and certainly there is a more marked difference among men with respect to their endowment with taste, than there is with respect to their possession of common sense and judgment. And in this, certain venerable authorities on rhetoric declare that Nature evinces her beneficence, making little distinction among her children in the bestowal of the faculties necessary to their well being and the conduct of the practical affairs of life, while she is more partial and capricious in the gift of those that serve for ornament rather than use.

The fact seems to be that, while taste is universal, and men, and even children possess it in some degree, it is of slower growth, and requires more careful culture, and is also characterized by greater diversity in its judgments, than is the case with the practical reason. There is little probability that sensible men will differ in opinion as to which is the better of two roads for traveling purposes, or of two streams for their mill privileges, but if the question is as to which is the more picturesque or romantic, there will be likely to be less unanimity; and ladies are far more liable to differ in regard to the colors, pattern and style of a dress, than as to the quality and durability of its fabric.

Yet every person who prefers one color to another, and even the child who prefers a round or symmetrically shaped object to one of irregular outline, possesses the rudiments of taste. It is something to be able to derive pleasure from any object whose appeal is to the intellect or the imagination through the nobler senses. And it should be borne in mind by those who are disposed to sneer at the judgments of imperfectly cultivated tastes, that inferior objects in art often kindle as much genuine admiration, and afford as legitimate a pleasure as those of a higher character. Imperfect taste, or taste not fully formed, yet in exercise, is a widely different thing from that torpor and indifference to the æsthetic aspects of things which seem like the absence of taste altogether; and there is something elevating—something to be respected in all unaffected enjoyment of what is beautiful in art or nature, even where the admiration is quite disproportionate to the real merits of the thing admired. The man who really enjoys pictures and poems, even though they are very poor pictures and poems, stands higher in the scale of being than the man who only enjoys pudding, let his taste in pudding be never so unimpeachable.

And hence we do not feel so despondent in regard to the prospects of art among us as most of our correspondents, or so much disposed to lecture our wealthy citizens upon their lack of taste. Provided they will buy pictures at all, we shall not consider it an outrage that they buy what they like. When a genuine interest in such objects is established and diffused in any community it is surprising to note how rapidly discrimination is sharpened, and how inevitably the higher judgment of the cultivated few comes to control that of the many. It is a significant and well-known fact that several of the most admirable private collections of paintings in England belong to men who when they commenced gathering them were utterly ignorant of art, and who beginning by purchasing showy and meretricious works, finished by becoming connoisseurs.

HIGHLY INDECOROUS.

THE Press always suffers in its character and influence, when it falls into the habit of pronouncing hasty judgments on important subjects of a delicate nature, more especially when such judgments are expressed with a flippant levity unsuitable to the gravity of the theme. No person who is in the habit of volunteering positive off-hand opinions upon every subject that arises, without thought or consideration, can reasonably expect that his ex cathedra decisions will command respect. The case is the same with newspapers, and thus the mingled arrogance and impertinence of that description of journals that insist on intermeddling with all matters public and private, without any regard to the proprietics, and assume to deliver oracular decisions on all questions social, moral, political, religious, or scientific, destroy their power for mischief by rendering them objects of ridicule. Newspapers that make nothing of reversing the decisions of the Supreme Court, correcting the theological errors of Doctors of Divinity, and settling in the most summary style knotty points of science or philosophy, are tolerably sure to find that the wisdom, cheapened by being so lavishly dispensed, carries little weight with the public.

One of the daily papers published in this city, recently alluded to the rumored suspension of the Rev. Mr. Eagan, Rector of St. James' Church, by the Episcopal Bishop of this diocese, in the following strain, in which it is not easy to determine whether a certain hardihood of ignorance, or its repulsive flippancy, is the predominant element:

"A storm has broken over the heads of the members of St. James's Church—an Episcopal Church Society recently organized in this city on the free seats plan. It appears that "My Lord Bishop Kip" is displeased with the Rector of St. James's, and has, in consequence, issued a bull commanding the Rev. Mr. Eagan not to preach another sermon. We do not know what the penalty will be in case Mr. Eagan refuses to obey the lordly mandate, but as this is supposed to be a free country, wherein those can preach who wish to, we presume that nothing worse than burning at the stake or flaying alive will follow as a result of disobeying orders. If we could be allowed to express an opinion in relation to Church matters, we should say that, as the Congregation of St. James's is composed of free white and intelligent citizens, they certainly have the right to say whether the Rev. Mr. Eagan, or Rev. Mr. somebody else, shall preach for them. We trust to see the free seats church movement succeed, in spite of My Lord Cardinal's opposition to it."

Now here we have a respectable daily paper, at least a paper possessing such respectability as attaches to large circulation and business prosperity, passing without the slightest appearance of diffidence or hesitation upon a grave ecclesiastical question, the very data for the decision of which are as yet unknown. And not only is it peremptorily decided that the Bishop is wrong and Mr. Eagan right in the premises, but the journalist cannot bring himself to speak of the former in the language of common courtesy. But even if too intensely Democratic in his ideas to be willing to show any especial deference to a high dignitary in one of the principal ecclesiastical organizations of the country, it would seem to have been scarcely necessary to be guilty of absolute rudeness, and to resort to coarse sneers for the purpose of showing his independence. Possibly, however, he understood no other way than the one he adopted. The naive observation, "If we could be allowed to express an opinion on church matters, we should say" etc., coming as it does in connection with so singular a display of puerility, sounds exceedingly droll.

Most assuredly "we" ought "to be allowed to express an opinion on church matters," or on the wave theory of light, or the poetry of Hafiz, or the origin of language, or the validity of the Moore title, or on any other subject in the entire range of human knowledge. For this is one of the privileges of "free white men" under the Constitution of the United States and the laws of the land, and we have no doubt that "we" are about as well qualified to deliver "an opinion on church matters" as on the other subjects enumerated.

Had the present question, however, instead of being an issue between a priest of the Protestant Episcopal Church in the State of California and his Diocesan, been between a Fenian Head Center and a subordinate functionary of the order, or between General Halleck and one of the officers under him, even a critic of this obtuse though ardent mental constitution would probably have been able to master the idea of a submission to constituted authority, even "by a free white American citizen" that is not servile, and of an exercise of such authority that is not tyrannical.

[For the Californian.]

GOOD-NIGHT.

GOOD-NIGHT,—Good night!
The hour of parting brings the hour of dreams:
Be thy sleep calm and deep,
A spell of down on silky eyelids laid;
Between our pillows distance only seems,
Darkness is a transparent shade,
And sweetest speeches silences inclose,
Like roses' perfume folded in the rose—
Growing intense as silence deeper grows:
Still nearest, and dearest,
Thy heart and mine will keep;
Through the dim star time, into the far clime,
Down Slumber's fathomless stream,
We shall float together, in balmy weather,
With thoughts of bliss agleam;
Good-night!

Good-night,—Good night!
These parting words are but a tender cheat:
We know, whether we go
Beyond arms' reach, or wide as worlds apart,
Together we shall throb at each heart-beat;
Thrilled by the same electric dart,
Shot from the arch god's arched bow,
Through either bosom's wall of snow—
Forever and forever be it so!
Though far as star from star,
Twin souls will interflow;
All the dusks between, are a filmy sheen,
But silver threads the tides,
And every "good-night" is a veil of delight,
Where Love transfigured bides:
Good-night!

LOCAL ART ITEMS.

WE wonder why neither Roos and Snow or Jones and Wooll, have paid any attention to light and proper facilities for the display of paintings in their galleries. At one place everything must be viewed through glazed sashes, rendering it a work of no small moment to assume a proper position for an observation; and at the other the light is so dim and uncertain, and the access so narrow and perilous that it hardly repays one a visit.

It requires considerable searching to find anything new in Art in this city, and this week's items will be few.

The art gallery at the Fair of the St. James' Church was not as well patronized as it should have been. Although a greater part of the pictures were uninteresting and had been often exhibited before, there were many paintings that were new and pleasing. We noticed very few works of New York and Boston artists, but there were many by foreign hands, and some very creditable productions of native amateurs. A collection of engravings, many of them rare and valuable, of the works of the old masters, were exhibited here, but hardly formed an attraction for visitors.

ARRIOLA has on view at Roos' a coast scene taken from some point near the Golden Gate. As it is so much superior to the majority of his pictures, it deserves attention. We find little fault with the drawing, and the surf and beach are very fairly painted; but here, as in all of his pictures—though perhaps less here than in others—there is a harshness, an unreality in his coloring, and a stiffness and rigidity in handling, which must be overcome before his pictures can please. The introduction into this picture of portraits of the artist and his military companion is a piece of clap-trap worn out in the war pictures of the Eastern illustrated papers.

NORTON BUSH exhibits views of California scenery—rather tame and insipid however, and entirely wanting in effect. The foreground lacks strength. This artist's faults are those that we think may be cured by study, and we hope to see a development of the talent his friends have promised. ASTRÆA.

TUESDAY, Oct. 9, 1866.

Messrs. Editors Californian:

Please tell me in your next paper who is the supposed author of Vestiges of the Natural History of Creation.

And very much oblige, INQUIRER.

The book has been attributed to numerous different authors, Darwin among the rest. But we believe there is now no dispute that Richard Vyvian is the name of the true author.

THE LION'S MOUTH.

The Fifth of Novemer.

THE Fifth of November is memorable in England as the day on which the plot of Guy Fawkes to blow up the Houses of Parliament was discovered. The coming Fifth of November is looked forward to with intense interest by the citizens of San Francisco. The first number of "The Daily Times, a first class morning journal," is to be issued on that day. The Alta, we understand, regards this enterprise as being a no less unholy one than that which was undertaken by Guy Fawkes. It is nerving all its energies to meet the blow. Great efforts are being made to increase the popularity of the Alta and all its attachés. Fitz Smythe has had his likeness painted in oil by a Chinaman and exhibited at the store of Messrs. Snow & Roos. on Montgomery street; the Major shows himself on the street; charity sermons in behalf of institutions for the relief of the poor and sick of all the nationalities represented in this city, are published semi-occasionally; a historical sketch of the Alta, setting forth the services it has done the State has been published; yet for all this does the Alta await the Fifth of November in fear and trembling. Will the Times be strong enough to disembowel the Alta? Will it drag from that venerable form the auctioneers' advertisements? Will it, like the horrid devil-fish, fasten a hundred suckers on its advertising veins and suck and suck until it leaves nothing but a shrunken carcase which not even electricity and the blood of a thousand battle-fields can reanimate with a factitious vitality? These are deeply interesting questions to the Alta. We await the Fifth of November.

The War of the Architects.

MR. EDITOR: So it appears that we have to import not only our school-marms from the Hub, but that we can't even build a school-house without sending to the Yankee Athens for the plans! No joke about this I assure you. The Flag has let the cat out of the bag, to the confusion and horror, no doubt, of the unfortunate gentleman who secured its damaging advocacy.

By the by, why don't you go into this war of Architects? perhaps you could make something out of it—don't let the Bulletin and Flag have all the glory.

Tell us some more about the Lincoln school. The good people will never tire of reading about the grandeur and elegance of that sarcophagus to the memory of the ex-architect of the Board St. Peter's is no where; Mike Angelo was a fogy. When that New Zealander sits on London bridge contemplating the ruins of St. Paul's, this "Palatial College of the People" will stand a monument to the genius of its designer and the disinterested parties to whom the tax payers are indebted for its construction.

The Bulletin folks thought they were doing the thing up about right; and they had it all their own way for a while, but they didn't lay it on strong enough; they didn't go back to Ancient History, and cause the glory of "Ye Ancient Architects" to pale by their compromise; they were not up to that sort of thing, you see, so the Flag got the job.

Now the Flag lacks discretion, and don't know when it has said enough. In their first article they "slopped over;" and, attempting to convince folks of the just claims of our friend to the school work, they let out the fact that the plans had been procured at the "Hub" regardless of expense. Now, of course none of these seven by nine architects who had the impudence to aspire to the designing of our schools, knew or could know anything about Boston school houses: still it was not necessary to rob him of the credit of having originated these various plans.

Their next article was worse yet; it was evidently made up from a re-perusal of "Thompson's Charges" and the newspaper comments on the Lincoln School contracts. Now that had nearly blown over, and it won't do to rake it up, but no one could help being reminded of that fuss You see if the Flag goes on it will ruin its friends in spite of itself. If you could only help the thing out, I know you could make it look all right and make some convincing arguments without knocking "the fat into the fire."

It would be worth your while to take hold of it and expose the woful corruption that has crept into the profession since the Board has tempted the outsiders to hope for public employment.

Yours with the etceteras, JEFFERSON SNORT.

An "Indian Legend"

The Call has a correspondent who, over the signature of "R," writes a very good letter from Pacific Congress Springs He relates a very pretty legend which does him credit:

AN INDIAN LEGEND.

"Roaming through the mountains, we discovered an almost extinct tribe of Indians, the existence of which is now probably not known by actual experience to any but Shillaber, the cynic, and myself. From this tribe we obtained a curious legend regarding the origin of the Congress Springs. There are three or four of these springs. One of them is continually ejaculating "Boo-ah! boo-ah!" pronounced low and soft. This word, it appears, signifies in the Indian dialect, respectively, "drink," "to drink," and "give me drink." The ancient Indians, it appears, had their mythological characters as well as the Greeks and Romans had theirs. One of the Indian demi-gods was Tucoolino, the God of Quiet. One day, ages ago, while walking along the mountain-tops, he was assailed by Borealihoso, the God of Winds. The latter, after giving the former a good drubbing, cast him down the mountain, and he fell fatally wounded. Tears of shame for his defeat flowed from his eyes, while his pains wrung from him bloody sweat. In his agony, he cried out piteously, "Boo-ah! boo-ah!" and so crying, died. His body congealed into rock; but his tears and sweat continued to flow, and his dying words continue to be repeated from the petrified body, saying, in the Indian language, "Drink! drink!" The tears are the saline waters of the springs, and the bloody sweat is the iron, which shows itself in red streaks of semi-liquid matter, trickling down the stony face of the dead and petrified Indian God."

This is such a pretty legend that we are quite sorry to find any flaws in it; but "R" has made a shocking mistake. He should not have called the God of Winds "Borealihoso." The "almost extinct tribe of Indians" would not be likely to derive the name of their God of Winds from the Latin "boreas," the North wind. Then again "Tucoolino, the God of Quiet," would not be the kind of god to kick up such a row when Borealiboso gave him a whipping—or at least he would have stopped by this time instead of going on continually "booahing." However, we hope that "R" will continue travelling, and will meet some more "almost extinct tribes of Indians," and learn other legends from them. Possibly the next tribe he meets will not understand either Latin or Greek.

A Fearful "Judgment."

In the Chicago Times of September 17th, we find an account of an actual occurrence with the following headings:

"AN ACCUSED MAN CALLS UPON GOD TO STRIKE HIM DEAD IF HE IS GUILTY—HE FALLS INSTANTLY TO THE FLOOR, A CORPSE."

After a moral introduction the Times continues:

"A little over a year ago there lived in a small village in Sweden a man by the name of Rosencrist, whose ostensible pursuit was that of a tailor, but rumor had it that his principle revenue was derived from poaching and stealing, and at least this impression was so strongly confirmed that he suddenly left that village to evade the arm of justice. He came to this country about eight months ago, and took up his residence in Chicago, where he again worked at his trade."

The Times knows all about the antecedents of this man, you see; he lived in "a small village in Sweden," was suspected of poaching, and came to America to avoid punishment for breaking the game laws. Then we are told how he took lodgings at a boarding-house, No. 144 Burnside street, in Chicago, and how some of the boarders soon after his arrival, missed sundry articles, but the Times says "no clue to the perpetrator could be found." We will let the Times finish the story:

"Yesterday afternoon another theft was discovered, and the proofs of guilt pointed directly to Rosencrist—no one else having been near the apartment since the time the articles stolen were last seen. On being accused, he stoutly denied the theft, but, finding no credence was given to the denial, he suddenly grew more passionate, and, lifting up his hand toward heaven, exclaimed that he hoped his "tongue would rot in his mouth, his head drop from his shoulders, and God strike him dead on the spot," if he was guilty. No sooner had these words escaped his lips, when he suddenly began to reel and stagger, and, before support could be given, he fell to the floor—dead. The excitement this incident created among the bystanders can better be imagined than described. Strong men stood paralyzed, women fainted, and none were able to speak for some minutes. The occurrence was so horrible, this apparent retribution so terrible, that men doubted their senses. But the dead man remained prostrate on the floor—a ghastly proof of the reality. The rumor of this strange and startling fatality soon spread through the neighborhood, and in a few minutes the house was filled with horror-stricken people, none of whom doubted that the hand of God was thus made visible."

Rosencrist, we see, was suspected of theft because he was seen near the room. He was accused, and indignantly denied being a thief. His denial was not believed. He then, in order to convince his accusers of his innocence, raised his hand towards heaven and hoped that "his tongue might rot in his mouth, his head drop from his shoulders, and God strike him dead on the spot if he was guilty." His tongue did not rot in his mouth, and his head did not fall from his shoulders, but he fell to the floor dead.

Now this is a really splendid story for educational purposes—to illustrate the danger of profane swearing, and of course of telling a lie. The Times tells us that he was a poacher while he was living in "a small village in Sweden;" the boarders in the house at 144 Burnside street missed things, and of course Rosencrist stole them. He called upon God to strike him dead if he was guilty—and he was "struck dead." Nothing could be more satisfactory. But after "strong men standing paralyzed, women fainting, and every one looking at this fearful instance of a "judgment," some gross-minded materialist must needs run out and bring a doctor.

"A physician was called, who pronounced the cause of death to be disease of the heart, produced by over excitement."

Now this is really dreadful. Of course that physician was an atheist. Here is a terrible example of the progress of Rationalism. We suppose the next day one of the boarders who had missed her brooch found it stowed away in a drawer, and then the others began to hunt for the missing articles, and found them all. Then the Times would come out with an acknowledgement that it was mistaken in Rosencrist having ever lived in "a small village in Sweden"—that it was another man—and would publish a column obituary of him as a man who had always borne the very best of characters; and say that it was not to be wondered at that the shock of being suddenly accused of theft should kill him. That atheist physician has much to answer for. Couldn't he have lent himself to a "pious fraud." The man was dead, and might have, even after death, have proved a blessing to his fellow creatures, by serving as a terrible warning. Oh what an atheistical, materialistical, rationalistical age we live in!

Mrs. Woxeackle on "The Sensation of the Week."

MR. ENNYTER: Well, I confess that I am dumfoundered! So it appears it was all true, and Mr. Eagan, nevertheless that he preaches so beautiful, (wich none can appreeshiate but them that have heerd) is a Jeshyut after all! Who would have thort it? It did take me so sudden when I fust heerd it, that I came near going rite off the hooks on a dead faint. It was Friday afternoon, a week ago, that Mrs. Van Slam who knows all that's going on, and spends pretty nigh all her time in goin' about pickin up the news and telling it, it was about four in the afternoon, when she come in, and says she "Maria Woxeackle" (wich she allers addresses me by,) "have you heerd the news?" And then without waitin for me to answer, wich she was so eagerlike and excited she could not wait for, she says, "The Bisbop bas suspeuded Mr. Eagan!" "O no," says I all in a tremble, "you don't tell me that!" for I thort sure enuff at first she meant they had hung Mr. Eagan, wich the judges say when they sentence murderers, I havin once been present and heerd twenty years ago in Ohio, when a poor wretch that worked on the farm was hung for killing a black man with a pitchfork in the field in harvest time, which the judge said, should be suspendid by the neck until you air dead, and God bave mercy on your soul. But, "laws, no," says Mrs. Van Slam, when she saw what a mistake I had made, "the poor man is not hung, but he's forbid to preach, and ordered to go home by the next steamer." But Saturday she calls again, and says she, "Maria, they do say he won't give up, and that he's going to preach in spite of the Bishop." How that woman knows everything as soon as it happens, and sometimes before it happens, which she does, is a mystery to me, and so we agreed to go to St. James and hear Mr Eagan, let what would happen, which Mrs. Van Slam vowed she would even if she was suspendid herself for it. But not a word was said about the trouble, and we went away no wiser than we came which greatly disappinted both of us, you may be sure. What's to come of it all mercy knows, but they do say that there will be a terrible time. Anyway I was much relieved to find that Mr. Eagan was only to be stopped preaching, (which he is'nt) instead of being hung.

Yours, Respectful, MARIA WOXCACKLE.

P. S. The fair turned out better than was expected, except the Art Gallery, wich cost for fitting up, et setteier, $400, and only brot in $180, wich is disgraceful to the taste of this community. The pictures were all high-toned, and the lady that presided over the gallery, wich she also did at the Christian Commisshun Fair, and wouldn't on that occashun admit any common trash, and rejected pictures by obskure persons, wich was offered by the owners and brot from Europe, being one by a Mr. Landseer, and one by a Mr. Roohens, and also she paints quite superior herself As to the picture called Seel Rock, admired by some, it looked just like what you can see every day from the balkony of the Cliff House; and who wants to pay their money for a picture that is nothing but a plain copy of what you can see for nothing, I should like to know? M. W.

Disinterested Advice.

Here is an article which is being republished by every ill looking editor in the United States:

"GOOD ANVICE.—Get married, young women! never panse because your suitor is not handsome. If he is good that is much better. Few handsome men are good for much, except to break wives' hearts with jealousy, and fail in business, because too much tempted, to attend to it assiduously."

How easy it is to imagine the appearance of the man who wrote that piece of good advice. A hang dog looking ruffian with no forehead, cross eyed, all his front teeth gone, a broken nose, and a mouth reaching from ear to ear. But good—not handsome but good. O yes, those villainous-looking wretches always are good. "Few handsome men are good for much except to break wives' hearts with jealousy, and fail in business because too much tempted to attend to it assiduously." Here is an infamous libel! The ugly face of the man who invented it must have been suffused with blushes as he wrote it—if he had any conscience, but very ugly men do not possess consciences as a rule. A nice life any pretty woman who married that hideous editor would lead. He would not make her break her heart with jealousy for him, but woe to her if she ever dare interchange a word with any but the most frightful males of the human species! He would watch her like a tiger; he would allow his business to go to ruin while he spent his time in lying in wait for good-looking men making calls on his wife. If he had said apologetically that some very plain looking men are not really so bad as they look he might have been forgiven, but to deliberately libel handsome men and declare that they are not good for much, is vile. There is one comfort for handsome men; let the ugly ones abuse them as much as they like the young women of the present day have good sense enough to value advice such as the above at its true value, and good taste enough to prefer beauty to ugliness.

The Atlantic Cable at Fault.

The Atlantic Cable is certainly a glorious institution. We receive news from Europe now with wondrous speed, but we do not get enough. The trans-continental telegraph informed the Associated Press of California, on Tuesday last, that Tom Thumb's baby was dead, but the news came from England by steamer. We ought to have known this on the 27th of last month—the baby died on the 26th but we received no intimation of it by the Cable. We ought to have known that the baby had a sore throat weeks ago, but we did not. The Associated Press reporter exhibited commendable promptitude in telegraphing this important news to us as soon as it was received in New York, but it ought to have reached there weeks before by the Atlantic Cable. We are afraid that if such news as this is allowed to come by steamer to this continent the Times will be unwilling to enter into arrangements to procure news by the Cable.

Quite a New Song.

The Golden Era says: "Mr. Gray, publisher, has placed us under obligations for a copy of the song sung by Miss Emma Howson, "Truth in Advance."

We never heard Miss Emma Howson sing "Truth in Advance," but we know that many operatic artistes on being offered an engagement, sing "Cash in Advance," and make the impressario come down to a very pretty tune. Miss Emma Howson sings "Truth in Absence" very sweetly as she does everything, but no one has as yet had sufficient courage to give such an incomprehensible title as "Truth in Advance" to a song.

Thorough.

The Call does not often express a decided opinion, but in comparing "Mark Twain" with "Artemus Ward," it goes the entire animal. It says: "There is just the difference between worth and worthlessness." We all know that "Mark Twain" is far funnier than "Artemus Ward," but "Artemus" has made a number of good jokes, and to pronounce him "worthless" is going a little too far. It is a pity that the Call when it does get off the fence in discussing any subject, always manages to tumble off.

The Shooting Season.

In this part of the earth the shooting season has already commenced; it commences in the heavens next month. Those who are not in bed will see thousands of shooting stars. It is to be hoped that none of these sporting meteors will knock out the Bull's eye, assassinate the Twins, knock the watering pot of Aquarius out of his hand, and frighten the Virgin into hysterics. However, the shooting season in the heavens will only last for five or six nights, and we may reasonably hope that no serious accidents will happen.

A Dangerous Experiment.

The people of Oakland have introduced quail into their gardens to destroy insects. Some of those pretty little pets will be served up on toast if the owners do not keep a sharp look out after them. Those who wish to get birds to destroy insects in their gardens had better procure a few gulls; they will do the business effectually, and no one will eat them.

"Times" Seasoning.

The staff of the Times is to consist of Jim McClatchy, superintending editor; Noah Brooks, heavy man; Billy Bosman, scissors; Bennett, general utility; and Ned Pepper, walking gentleman or "local items." Watered by Brooks and seasoned by Pepper the Times will flourish as a first class paper.

Jewish Sacrifice to a Heathen Deity.

By a euphemism persons are said, when they are sea-sick, to make an offering to Neptune. This must certainly be the "heave offering" and "wave offering" enjoined by the Levitical law.

A Suggestion.

During his tour on the continent of Europe "Mark Twain" will have to put on a few foreign airs. We would suggest that to flatter the Prussians he would do well to render his name "Bis-mark."

EARLY RISERS.

EVERY reasonable man—every one, that is, who gets up when he chooses and goes to bed when he feels inclined—has at times been vexed by the zeal of early risers. If two men take the same allowance of sleep, but one of them begins it at eleven o'clock and the other at two, the first will feel himself a moral head and shoulders above his friend. He fancies himself to be standing on a little pedestal of conscious virtue, from which he may, figuratively speaking, flap his wings and crow over his inferiors. He is always pointing out that, by his self denial and constant superiority to the ordinary weaknesses of humanity, he has set an example whose influence can hardly be over-estimated. However carefully he may act the part of modest merit, he glows with an inward satisfaction which can never be quite repressed. He could not, though he would, hide his light under a bushel; it shines through him as through an alabaster vase; he is too much of an angel among common men to be able quite to cover up his wings.

He glories, even in secret, over his self-inflicted miseries; but, to extract from such recollections all the consolation which they can afford, it is necessary to share them with other people. He is delighted to speak with authority as to the state of the weather between six and seven in the morning. He brings in studiously unintentional references to his walks before breakfast, and he goes quietly to sleep after dinner as if he had earned a clear right to a little repose. Few people have strength of mind enough really to bear up against claims of this kind. Radicals, who say, perhaps very sincerely, that a man's a man for a' that, sometimes betray a perceptible awkwardness in the presence of a lord. No one will admit that mere wealth has any claims to respect; yet we somehow feel an instinctive deference towards a man with a good balance at his banker's, of which we are not conscious towards his neighbor who lives from hand to mouth. In the same way, few people really dare to dispute the merits of a man who gets up at six in the morning; he has accumulated a balance of solid virtue which gives an undefined weight of respectability to his actions. It appears to be merely due to his benevolence that he does not crush you to the earth with a sense of moral inferiority.

And yet, if we could only venture to make a stand, perhaps we might find that this claim is so imposing only because it has not been critically tested. Early rising is, to a considerable extent, a proof of imperfect civilization. In the old time everybody was up with the sun; but the invention of candles, and the change from physical to intellectual labor, have altered all the conditions of life. The evening hours are now superior in almost every respect to those of the morning. In a social point of view, it is unnecessary to demonstrate that no man can enjoy society before breakfast. Strictly speaking, man does not become a social being until breakfast, and even then the instinct exists in a very modified form; many people read the newspaper at breakfast, but no one could be brute enough to read it at dinner. In those barbarous times when dinner took place about midday, supper was the really sociable meal, which has been gradually superseded by the onward movement of dinner. From all this it follows that a man's social tendencies are almost always in the inverse ratio of his propensity to early rising.

When Cæsar remarked, "Let me have men about me that are fat, sleek-headed men and such as sleep o' nights," he evidently meant to condemn, not the unfortunate beings who may be physically lean, but the restless temperament which leads to early rising, self-conceit, discontent, and conspiracy. If people who get up prematurely are disagreeable, and even dangerous, in a social point of view, they will equally fail to justify themselves on intellectual grounds. Those who delight in always firing off small prudential maxims of the "early to bed, early to rise" variety generally denounce the practice of study at night. But here, again, the assumption seems to be gratuitous. The early riser descends every morning into a partial chaos; fires are smoking and green wood sputtering; every house is haunted by unkempt servants, with dusters and shovels, going through the hateful process of putting things in order; the world is slowly getting under weigh, and the machinery moves at first with slow jerks and creaks, and raising clouds of dust. It is absurd to suppose that such an atmosphere of discomfort can be more favorable to mental labor than the harmonious quiet of the evening, when a man may entrench himself in perfect repose, without a fear of interruption; when all the discordant elements of the day have more or less shaken into their places. Every smoker knows the superiority of the evening over the morning cigar; which proves that a philosophical and contemplative frame of mind is far more easily attained at the end than at the begining of the day, a mental attitude of serene meditation being essential to intelligent smoking. Man's powers may be supposed to be fresher and less exhausted in the morning; but, as a rule, this advantange is counterbalanced by the diminution of restlessness and irritability, and the greater power of concentration, produced by the evening calmness. We, therefore, consider that, for almost all purposes, the evening hours have a distinct superiority over the morning for the civilized part of mankind, whose pursuits do not require daylight, and who know the use of gas and candlelight.

For those who have to labor in the fields or workshops, or to get their living by hunting, like savages, there are obvious advantages about making the most of the daylight. The sentiment about early rising is a traditionary instinct, which has wandered into an era where it is not wanted. It is too bad that cultivated beings should go on quoting at us their little hoard of maxims, which at best are gross anachronisms, as though they were eternal truths; and that even the most modest of men should go about running over with ill-concealed complacency, because they have arranged their day on an obsolete hypothesis. If, however, we should be disposed to grant that there is really something in the claim which early risers put forward so pretentiously to the virtue of activity, we should still wish to know why it is of so specially offensive and aggressive a type. Why must they be always dashing it in our faces, and giving thanks at every turn that they are not as other men? Why should an early riser walk through the world wrapped in an invisible cloak of moral pre-eminence? After all, we are fellow-creatures, even if we are too fond of our beds in the morning. The most rabid of the sect must admit that a man is not necessarily a drunkard nor an abandoned slave to his passions because he does not get up at six o'clock; and yet, whilst mixing with the outer world, they always contrive to make it felt that all but themselves are more or less publicans and sinners.

An explanation of the abnormal development of self-esteem to which this and some other second-rate virtues give rise may perhaps be found in the very fact of their smallness. A man who has performed some great and heroic action is bound in honor not to boast of it; he may generally assume, too, that other people will be sufficiently disposed to recognize his claims without requiring them to be put obtrusively forward; but the family of petty virtues to which early rising belongs—punctuality, order, and so forth—require some additional inducements for their practice. They are not amiable qualities. Nobody loves a man the better for always remembering that procrastination is the thief of time, that a stitch in time saves nine, and that a penny saved is a penny got; on the contrary, we are rather apt to consider him as a standing insult to us for our own deficiencies in those respects. It is, therefore, provided, as a natural compensation, that they should give rise to a disproportionate amount of self-satisfaction. Such men are generally more conceited than any other class of meritorious citizens. They look down with a contempt, sometimes affable and sometimes simply arrogant, upon any one whom they fancy to be less of a walking ledger than themselves.

A Frightened Chinese Barber.—After my friend had visited the porcelain tower, being somewhat fatigued, he stept into a barber's shop, and, by way of employing his time, he desired the barber to shave his head. This gentleman wore a wig, but which, for the sake of coolness, he had placed in his pocket. This operation of shaving, so common in China, was speedily and quickly executed, the barber seeming to be delighted with the honor of shaving one of the illustrious strangers. Previously to his leaving the shop, and while the man's attention was called in some other direction, my friend replaced his wig upon his head, little thinking of the result of this simple process. No sooner, however, had the barber turned round and observed him whom he had so lately cleared of every vestige of hair suddenly covered with a most luxuriant growth, than, taking one steady gaze at him, to make sure he was not deceived, he let fall his razor, cleared the counter at a bound, and, running madly through the crowd, which was speedily collected, cried out that he was visited by the devil. No entreaties could induce him to return until every Fanqui had left the neighborhood—so palpable a miracle as this being, in his opinion, quite beyond the powers of all the gods or demons in the Bhuddist calender.—An Aid-de-Camp's Recollection Service.

Ladies, as a rule, are apt to be favorably impressed by gentlemen who "wrap themselves up in the solitude of their own originality," and defy the world to probe the inner depths of their souls. Woman is prone to believe that she can read such characters like an open book; that she has a key to all their mysteries. Underneath the marble exterior she sees plenty of plastic material which only needs her love and tact to leaven into delightful shapes. Minds of tenderness, of intelligence, of magnanimity underlie, she thinks, the blank upercrust of reserve. Too often, after having tried her hand at working them, she repents of her folly in sackcloth and ashes. Your utterly undemonstrative men seldom make good husbands. Understand, however, that there is a wide difference between morbid reticence and mere shyness. The shy man keeps you at a distance from him by shrinking back from you, the unconfiding man by holding you at arm's length. A lady about to make a choice for life between the two will do well to give the prefereuce to the former. Very reserved men are very difficult to govern.

DUMAS' NEW NOVEL.

THE new story of Alexandre Dumas fils is called "The Clemenceau affair; the memoir presented by the prisoner," and purports to be the defence of the hero written for the guidance of his advocate:

The character of the heroine is said to be drawn from that of a conspicuous lady of the Bonaparte family, or rather to be composed of a mixture of the characteristic feature of all the females of that race. It tells of the insane love of an artist for the woman he has married in spite of her want of family and fortune, and of the surprise and bitter deception with which, the very day after his marriage, he discovered the total want of principle, of delicacy, of decency, apparent in every expression to which she gives utterance. Before the year has elasped he discovers a guilty correspondence between his wife and a brother artist and learns by accident that there have been many others before this. Despair seizes on his soul. He insists upon a separation, and each goes on his way through the world. The wife finds at last the treasure for which she has been seeking—a rich lover who kept her in scandalous spleudor. The husband goes to Rome in search of that peace which can be his no more. He returns and sees his wife in all the splendor of her beauty, and, accepting her invitation to visite her in the magnificence allotted by her keeper, stabs her to the heart that she may deceive no more men. This novel is a chef d'œuvre in its display of the motives which actuates the human mind under peculiar influences. The character of the heroine will remain a type like that of the Dame aux Camelias. Every speech is characteristic of the sensual, insensible, cruel and voluptuous beauty of Paris life, to whom all idea of feminine purity is unknown. Standing before the chaste and sensitive artist in a costume repugnant to his sense of property, he exclaims with wounded delicacy, "Ah, my dear love, imagine what would be your annoyance if any one were to appear just now?" "Pshaw, they would not be so much to be pitied after all," is the reply, evidently suggested by that of the Princess Pauline, when some of her friends, wondering how she could bear to stand to Canova for the Venus, she answered with the most perfect coolness, "Oh' it was not unpleasant. Canova had taken care to have his studio well warmed for the occasion." The novel has given annoyance at the Tuilleries; but the author, of course, denies all idea of appropriation of the peculiarities of the Princess Borghese to his heroine.

A FRENCH SKETCH OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

DAUGHTER of a tyrant, as odious and cruel as any in history, and of a young, innocent queen, the most touching victim of the terrible Henry VIII., the young Elizabeth grew up on the steps of the scaffold which was to see so many victims. As a child, she had the courage not to tremble before her father; she could regard the execution of the most beautiful women and the greatest men without blanching. She was early accustomed to the noise of the chains, locks, and the axe, and amid all she could still smile. For this innocent girl, reserved for such high destiny, the reign of Bloody Mary was full of dangers and trial; and when she was fetched from the Tower, and told that she was queen, she trembled within herself at the thought of all the murders committed by Mary Tudor. A great day then commenced for Protestant England, which was then to live under clement laws, and, above all things, under an English queen. She was twenty-five years of age, in all the eclat of her youth and beauty; her head was evidently well-fitted to wear a crown, and her hand to hold the golden sceptre. At her first glance she saw the greatest men of England at her feet, and ready to aid her with all their courage, their experience, and their virtue. Never did more worthy counsellors address ears better fitted to listen to them; and we, children of the Salic law, are dazzled, as it were, at the sight of so much grandeur around a throne occupied by a princess of twenty-five.

Treatment of Women in Vienna.—Mr. Sala, writing from Vienna, thus describes a shocking incident: "Alongside of that prodigious new Opera House they are building, in the Karnthnerstrasse, a new sewer is being excavated. Peeping into a huge trench, lately, I counted one hundred and fifty women at work there—dreadful creatures who had lost all the softness and suppleness of their sex, were coarse of feature and muscular of arm, and plied the pick and shovel, and flung the dirt about with a will, and shouted to each other in harsh tone and with uncouth gesture. Clad in unwomanly gear, slouched hats tied on to their heads, their arms and necks bare, their skirts little better than aprons, their legs cased in huge bucket boots, their features worn, furrowed, and begrimed—these poor creatures filled me with a sickening horror."

Batty, the lion-tamer, has retired from "the lion's mouth," like a returned information in the old days of Venice, and, having made a heap of money, declines to be eaten by any king of the forest. He has had an escape or two lately, which may have added to his desire to avoid a public death.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

THE FALL OF VENICE.

[The following lines on the fall of Venice in 1849 have an interest at present arising from the recent redemption of that province and city from Austrian rule. They were composed by an Italian lady, very young at the time.]

O'ER the murky air
Chill twilight falls;
Silent I gaze
On the distant walls:
Silent and sad
From the terrace-height
I gaze on Venice,
My soul's delight!

Behind the clouds
Of the pillared west
The evening beam
Sinks fast to rest;
And plaintive rises
A hollow moan:
'Tis the parting sign
Of the deep lagoon.

A gondola
Steals on my sight:
Ho! gondola,
What news to night?
"The plague spreads fiercely,
Our food is spent;
The white flag waves
O'er the battlement."

Oh! shine no more,
Italia's sun,
On fortune vanquished,
On hope undone!
Ye shades; still bide
Each coming noon;
Sigh on forever,
Thou deep lagoon!

Venice! behold,
The hour is come:
Thou'rt called to meet
The martyrs' doom;
The plague spreads fiercely,
The food is spent,
The white flag waves
O'er the battlement.

The death came not
By the cannon's crash,
By the winged bolt,
Or the kindling flash;
But the living death
Is thine to die,
Of a city starving
In agony!

Record, O Fame,
In future story,
Her tyrants' crimes,
Her patriots' glory;
And curse the foe,
Till thy cry is hoarse,
Who would seize fair Venice,
A famished corse!

Sternly she met
The desperate strife,
Dauntless she struggled
With ebbing life;
But the plague spreads fiercely,
Her food is spent,
And the white flag waves
O'er her battlement.

Down on these stones
I dash my lyre,
With Freedom's knell
Its notes expire:
This my last song,
Lov'd Venice, hear!
Take my last kiss,
My parting tear.

When wandering lonely
In foreign climes,
Thou shalt live in my thoughts
Of other times.
Enshrined in my heart
Thy form shall rest,
Like the first fond dream
Of the lover's breast.

Now all around
Night's shadows brood;
Low moans the wind
O'er the darkened flood;
The chords are broken,
My voice is spent—
And the white flag waves
O'er the battlement.

EXPANDING THE CHEST.

THOSE in wealthy circumstances, or who pursue sedentary employments within doors, generally use their lungs but very little, —breathe but very little air into the chest; and thus, independently of positions, contract a wretchedly narrow, small chest, and lay the foundation for the loss of health and beauty. All this can be perfectly obviated by a little attention to the manner of breathing. Recollect, the lungs are like a bladder in their structure, and can be stretched open to double their ordinary size, with perfect safety, giving a noble chest, and a perfect immunity from consumption. The agent, and only agent required, is the common air we breathe, supposing, however, that no obstacle exists, external to the chest, such as lacing, or tying it around with stays, or tight dress, or have shoulder-straps upon it. On rising from the bed in the morning, place yourself in an erect posture, your head thrown back, and shoulders entirely off the chest; now inhale or suck in all the air you can, so as to fill the chest to the very bottom of it, so as no more air can be got in; now hold your breath, and throw your arms off behind, holding in your breath as long as possible. Repeat these long breaths as many times as you please; when done in a cold room it is much better, because the air is much denser, and will act much more powerfully in expanding the chest. Exercise the chest in this manner, it will become very flexible and expansive, and will enlarge the capacity and size of the lungs.

HE WOULD NOT DIE THE DEATH OF THE RIGHTEOUS.—Somebody tells a good story of a visit to a revival meeting. He modestly took a retired seat in the gallery, and listened quietly. When the sermon, whose text was, "Let me die the death of the righteous," was ended, the minister requested "all those who would like to die the death of the righteous" to stand up. Our friend, regarding himself as only an "outsider," kept his seat. Every one else rose. Soon he saw his error; for, after the prayer was over and the audience seated, the pastor cast a withering glance at our friend and said: "The number of those who did not rise is so small that I shall take no advantage of them." A man in his vicinity whispered; "Why, here is some one in our midst who doesn't want to die the death of the righteous?" And as our friend was trying to steal quietly out, he heard an ancient lady say to her companion: "Sakes alive! if there isn't the poor sinner who is against dying the death of the righteous!"

VERY intelligent women, we find by observation, are seldom beautiful. The formation of their features, and particularly their foreheads, is more or less masculine. Miss Lander was rather pretty and feminine in the face, but Miss Sedgwick, Miss Pardoe, Miss Leslie, and the late Anna Maria and Jane Porter, the contrary. One of the Misses Porter had a forehead as high as that of an intellectual man who was admired for his personal beauty. Pope was awfully ugly; Dr. Johnson was no better; Mirabeau was the ugliest man in all France, and yet he was the greatest favorite with the ladies. Women more frequently prize men for their sterling qualities of the mind, than men do women. Dr. Johnson chose a women who had scarcely an idea above an oyster, He thought her the loveliest creature in existence, if we may judge by the inscription he left on her tomb.

REST.

"I CAN scarcely hear," she murmured,
"For my heart beats loud and fast,
But surely, in the far, far distance,
I can hear a sound at last."
"It is only the reapers singing,
As they carry home their sheaves;
And the evening breeze has risen,
And rustles the dying leaves."

"Listen! there are voices talking,"
Calmly still she strove to speak;
Yet her voice grew faint and trembling,
And the red flushed in her cheek.
"It is only the children playing
Below, now their work is done,
And they laughed that their eyes are dazzled
By the rays of the setting sun."

Fainter grew her voice, and weaker,
As with anxious eyes she cried,
"Down the avenue of chestnuts
I can hear a horseman ride."
"It is only the deer that were feeding
In a herd on the clover grass;
They were startled, and fled to the thicket,
As they saw the reapers pass."

Now the night arose in silence,
Birds lay in their leafy nest,
And the deer couched in the forest,
And the children were at rest;
There was only a sound of weeping
From watchers round a bed,
But rest to the weary spirit,
Peace to the quiet dead!

MIS-QUOTATIONS.

A WRITER in the Charleston News corrects some mis-quotations, from which we give the following:

What is more common than the expression "from that bourn whence no traveler returns." There is no such phrase. The words of the poet are "The undiscover'd country from whose bourn no traveler returns"—Hamlet 3, 1. Bourn means limit, boundary, and only as the poet used it, is the strength of the passage seen:

"A looker-on in Venice" is as common as household words. But the following is the correct version: In Measure for Measure, 5. 1, the Duke says: "My business in this State made me a looker on here in Vienna, where I have seen corruption and bubble till it o'errun the stew."

But the last example I will give of popular misquotation is the most remarkable. In newspapers, in books—in speeches of men who ought to be educated—everywhere we meet with the phrase "to the manor born;" referring to locality. The true language is found in the following, It occurs when there is a flourish of trumpets, and Hamlet asked his friend Horatio what it means, and he is told in plain English that it is the custom when the King drains his bowl at his banquet.

HOR.—A custom is it?—

HAM.—Ay marry is't. But to my mind, though I am native here, and to the manner born, it is a custom more honored in the breach than the observance."

These remarks have been elicited by a quotation which stood at the head of one of your leaders, a day or two ago, which caught my eye as a false note does the ear of a musician. "Under which King, Mercutio." These were the offending words. I do not think there is such a phrase. I presume it was a mistake for this: "Under which King, Bezonian? Speak or die." 2 Hen. I V. 5, 3.

COLERIDGE was descanting, in the presence of Charles Lamb, upon the repulsive appearance of the oyster. "It isn't handsome, Coleridge," said Elia; "but it has the advantage of you in one thing." "What is that?" queried Coleridge, who, as every one knows, was an exhaustless talker. "It knows when to shut its mouth." was the reply.

A GOOD LIBRARY.—I no sooner set foot in a good library and fasten the door, than I shut out ambition, love, and all those vices of which idleness is the mother and ignorance the nurse; and in the very lap of eternity, among so many illustrious souls, I take my seat with so lofty a spirit that I then pity the great, who nothing know of such real happiness.—Southey.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND

IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

BESSIE SHIELDS, Plaintiff, vs. PETER SHIELDS, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to PETER SHIELDS, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and for general relief and costs.

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 1st day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six.

SONG OF THE MECHANIC.

THE hum of a thousand wheels in our ear,
Like some old ponderous gong;
The sledge-hammer ringing alarms in the glare,
The groan of a press, as if burdened with care;
The tramp of the iron horse, fleeter than air,
And his thundering snort, heard everywhere;
'Tis but the orchestra that e'er
Accompanies their song.

* * * * * * *

Men of the brawny arm are we,
Men not ashamed of labor;
Though clouds may sometimes veil our face,
Our heart shines through in smiles that chase
The darkness from our neighbor.

We are the men that forge the bars
That link the town and lea,
Where engines rushing through the vale—
Our children, racing with the gale—
Are shouting lustily!

The mighty ship, that proudly rides
Over the restless deep,
Was reared by us; her noiseless wings
Bend to the evening breeze that sings
And rocks her into sleep.

The Press—that throbbing heart where beats
The pulse of every thought;
The clock of mind which strikes the hour,
And a nation rises in its power—
Without our aid is naught.

The pen which, dipped in lightning, writes
At one stroke round the earth,
Ne'er stayed by mountain nor the river
On whose broad face the sunbeams quiver,
Owes to our hands its birth.

These thoughts make gladness in our hearts
Re-echo like a bell;
And, like her voice who waits to greet us,
Or leads our little child to meet us,
More sweet than we may tell.

Then let our joyous song be heard,
Let all be filled with mirth;
Let it be known throughout the land
That the members of our iron band
Are the happiest on earth.

The sound that lingers in our ear,
Like some old ponderous gong,
Is but the orchestra that e'er
Accompanies their song.

PUSH AHEAD.—Woe to him who lacks energy in this age of push. He is a pigmy among Samsons. The little life he has in him is sure to be trampled out. Onward is the word, and the vigorous marchers are pitiless. They time their steps to the quick beating of their own hearts, and keep moving while the pulse-throb lasts.

MORALITY without religion is only a kind of dead-reckoning—an endeavor to find our place on a cloudy sea by measuring the distance we have run, and without any observation of the heavenly bodies.

AYER'S
Cathartic Pills,

ARE THE MOST PERFECT purgative which we are able to produce, or which we think has ever yet been made by anybody. Their effects have abundantly shown to the community how much they excel the ordinary medicines in use. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. Their penetrating properties stimulate the vital activities of the body, remove the obstructions of its organs, purify the blood, and expel disease. They purge out the foul humors which breed and grow distemper, stimulate sluggish or disordered organs into their natural action, and impart a healthy tone with strength to the whole system. Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases. While they produce powerful effects, they are at the same time, in diminished doses, the safest and best physic that can be employed for children. Being sugar-coated, they are pleasant to take; and, being purely vegetable, are free from any risk of harm. Cures have been made which surpass belief, were they not substantiated by men of such exalted position and character, as to forbid the suspicion of untruth. Many eminent clergymen and physicians have lent their names to certify to the public the reliability of our remedies, while others have sent us the assurance of their conviction that our Preparations contribute immensely to the relief of our afflicted, suffering fellow men.
The Agent below named is pleased to furnish gratis our American Almanac, containing directions for the use and certificates of their cures, of the following complaints:
Costiveness, Bilious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache arising from foul stomach, Nausea, Indigestion, Morbid Inaction of the Bowels and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Diseases which require an evacuant medicine. They also, by purifying the blood and stimulating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach, such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability, Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout, and other kindred complaints arising from a low state of the body, or obstruction of its functions.
Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand AYER'S and take no others. The sick want the best aid there is for them, and they should have it.
Prepared by J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by CRANE & BRIGHAM, San Francisco, and all Dealers

STOP THAT COUGHING.
SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure. but
NEWELL'S
PULMONARY SYRUP
is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded or the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of
NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,
and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that
Newell's Pulmonary Syrup
has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.
Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of
Newell's Pulmonary Syrup.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.
THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.
As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.
It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.
It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea-sickness, or other causes.
It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

THE RIVEN HEART.

I HAVE a secret, none shall know
The bitter cause of all my woe;
No sighs betray, no teardrops start,
To tell what's buried in my heart;
Unseen and deep it rankles there,
And in its anguish hugs despair.
As I feel each waking morrow,
Brings a darker load of sorrow:
No one with me shall ever share
The crushing burden of my care;
Save God and I there's none shall know,
The bitter cause of all my woe.

Perhaps a heartless world may blame
Such feeling for another's shame;
The love that once was warm and true,
And pure as drops of verual dew—
Is from my heart forever gone,
And frozen as the frigid zone.
No look of sadness yet I wear,
But all my troubles calmly bear;
I am resigned, and come what will—
Let Grief her largest measure fill,
And haggard Care present the cup—
Heart-riven I shall quaff it up;
Save God and I there's none shall know,
The bitter cause of all my woe.

I'd rather have a spotless name
Than live upon the fruits of shame;
When I believe that day is night,
And vice is seemly to the sight—
I may forget the wrongs I feel,
And all the wounds time may not heal.
Dark misery must be my lot,
Till all the past can be forgot;
Yet here I vow that while I live,
My faith has taught me to forgive.
Lock'd in the casket of my breast,
The secret there shall ever rest;
Save God and I there's none shall know,
The bitter cause of all my woe.

No more I'll feel the joys of peace,
Till memory fades and throbbings cease;
For dark with shadows wrapt in gloom,
The future seems a living tomb;
The idols of my heart are cold,
And prondly kneel at shrines of gold.
Ties tender once are now estranged,
And things of light to darkness changed;
The snows of age rest on my head,
And all my cherished hopes are dead.
Soon shall these heavy eyelids close,
Where all the weary find repose;
Save God and I there's none shall know,
The bitter cause of all my woe.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 1st., 1866. JAMES LINEN.

"VESUVIAN TEA" is a very amusing trifle of a chemical kind, that has followed in the wake of "Pharaoh's Serpents" Two packets of yellow dust and a tin tray with a handle are sold, in England, under this name. The dust is placed in the tray, which is then held over the candle, and, to the astonishment of the beholder, in an instant the tray becomes full to overflowing, with what appears to be excellent green tea. Half the yellow dust is enough to make a good tray full. It can be procured for a trifle at the toy warehouses in London.

FLORAL FASHIONS.

PERHAPS some of the readers of THE CALIFORNIAN—its fair readers—may wish to know what is the newest and latest fashion in the Floral World, as well as in the World of Dress, and as Royalty leads the fashions in one sphere, why should it not in the other?

THE PRINCESS MARY'S WEDDING BOUQUET.

Ever since the marriage of the Princess Royal, Mr. Veitch, of the Royal Exotic Nursery, Chelsea, London, has enjoyed the privilege of presenting the members of the Royal Family with their wedding bouquets. That honor and privilege has, on a recent marriage of the Princess Mary of Cambridge, been again accorded to that establishment, and Messrs. Veitch & Sons, by special permission, presented the Princess with a splendid bouquet, which consisted of orange blossoms, phalœnopsis, odontoglossum, calanthe, burlingtonias, stephanotis, white roses, etc.—the garniture being of Honiton lace. Her Royal Highness was graciously pleased to accept it personally from the hands of Mr. Harry J. Veitch.

FLOWERS FOR WEDDINGS AND FUNERALS.

Flowers are every day becoming more sought after as a decoration, both for weddings, parties, and at funerals. One florist at the East lately filled an order for one thousand dollars worth of flowers for a funeral.

Wreaths, coronets, and bouquets, made either of natural or artificial plants and flowers of every color and form, have been from the earliest times the delights and ornaments of those fairest of created beings Women, in every civilized nation and climate of the world. Even the barbarian natives of some of the South Sea Islands take a natural pleasure in, and prefer plants and flowers to the feathers and trinkets most savages delight in.

M. Lesson tells us in particular, that the inhabitants of Otaheite, Oceanica, Caroline, and the Sandwich Islands, wear garlands of flowers and sweet smelling leaves upon their persons and garments. They delight in making wreaths of flowers of the most beautiful colors, intermixed with others that possess the sweetest scents amongst others—the blossoms of the arum, ixora, gardenia florida, and hibiscus rosea sinensis. They likewise fix a single stalk through a hole in each ear, and suspend a single flower, as our race does the ear drop.

THE LOVE OF ROSES.

The love of the ancients for roses was something fanatical. I do not so much refer to the poets, for probably the modern and the antique bards may vie with each other in the use of the rose as a common place of poetical illustration; but I allude to a strong passion for the visible, tangible, scent giving rose, as something to be enjoyed by all the five senses, scarcely excluding that of hearing; for a rustle of many roses must have attended some of the more extraordinary manifestations of idolatry.

A time without roses was a contingency to be avoided at any cost, and the Romans, though the mildness of their climate allowed the adored flower to grow at an unusually late season, could not submit to the privations of a winter.

Not only were whole ship loads of roses brought from Alexandria in the inclement season, but various means were devised for preserving the gathered flowers throughout the year with as much freshness as was attainable.

The wreath of roses, of which one reads and writes about so often, without any other image than that of a curved twig with a tolerably rich supply of floral ornaments, was capable of a high degree of elaboration; for the Roman florists looked upon an enlacement of whole flowers as an exceedingly meagre affair.

For a grand work of art they took the rose leaves separately, laid them over each other like scales, and thus produced a sort of fragrant sausage.

This refinement in the construction of wreaths, will show that the luxurious ancients not only insisted on the constant presence of roses, but were determined to have them in as large a quantity as possible.

The anecdotes that illustrate this form of the floral passion could scarcely be surpassed in wonder by the wildest imaginations. "To enjoy the scent of roses at meals," says Herr Wustman, "an abundance of rose leaves was shaken out upon the table, so that the dishes were completely surrounded." By an artificial contrivance, roses, during meals, descended on the guests from above. Heliogabalus, in his folly, caused violets and roses to be showered down upon his guests in such quantities that a number of them, being unable to extricate themselves, were suffocated in flowers. During meal times they reclined upon cushions stuffed with rose leaves, or made a couch of the leaves themselves. The floor, too, was strewn with roses, and in this custom great luxury was displayed.

One of the most touching incidents I ever saw was at the churchyard of an Eastern village on a quiet Sabbath morning. The grave of one who was universally beloved while living, was covered with flowers in the early morning; and when the congregation assembled, it was the best sermon they ever had preached to them. IRIS.

CORRESPONDENCE.

To the Editor of the Californian:

I HAVE seen several communications lately inquiring as to whom Tennyson refers to in the first verse of "In Memoriam:"

> "I held it truth, with him who sings
> To one clear harp in divers tones,
> That men may rise on stepping stones
> Of their dead selves to higher things."

One correspondent suggests Gœthe, and another Wordsworth and Longfellow; but I think that the poet had neither one of the first mentioned in his mind, while the latter is by far too modern a writer. Now it seems to me that St. Augustine is the one who is meant: for the latter part of the verse is a free rendering of the following sentence which occurs in his sermon "De Ascensione:" "De vitiis nostris scalam nobis facimus, si vitia ipsa calcamus."

Longfellow, in one of his later poems, comes still nearer—

> "Saint Augustine! well hast thou said
> That of our vices we can frame
> A ladder if we will but tread
> Beneath our feet each deed of shame." H. K. G.

THE GHOST AT THE FUNERAL.

To the Editor of the Californian:

A few days since, I found a part of a poem entitled as above, on a fragment of newspaper used to wrap up a parcel from a store. There were but two entire stanzas on the fragment, and they were as follows:

> "The funeral pageant fills the aisles;
> Slowly they come, all robed in black,
> Behind her coffined form, whose smiles
> Drew my heart, tortured, to the rack,
> In those sad years of mine when earth
> Beside those smiles held little worth.
> "How brief the time now seems, since I
> In shroud and pall was lying here!
> And did they think that she could die,
> And he entombed, and I not here?—
> I, who, despite her rank and pride,
> Knelt for her love, and failed, and died."

Now, I should like very much to know where I can find this poem, that commences so weirdly. Can you give me any information as to its authorship?

Yours respectfully, MAUD.

We think we have seen the poem referred to, in the Atlantic Monthly, where it appeared, if we are not mistaken, about a year ago. It was copied by the Morning Call of this city soon after its appearance, and is attributed to Longfellow, though assuredly not in his ordinary vein or style. Possibly some of our readers can furnish more definite information.

A MAN called at the post-office, the other day, and displayed his ignorance of natural history or the French language, or both, by requesting to be supplied with a stamped antelope!

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES,

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, a gambler and spendthrift, walks down from London to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs. Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother.

CHAPTER II.

IN THE HOUSEKEEPER'S ROOM.

GEORGE DALLAS had eaten but sparingly of the food which Mrs. Brookes had placed before him. He was weary and excited, and he bore the delay and the solitude of the housekeeper's room with feverish impatience. He strode up and down the room, stopping occasionally before the fire to kick at the crumbling logs, and glance at the clock, which marked how rapidly the night was waning. Half an hour, which seemed three times a much to him, had elapsed since Mrs. Brookes had left him. Faintly and indistinctly the sounds of the music reached him, adding to his irritation and weariness. A savage frown darkened his face, and he muttered to himself in the same tone as that of his spasmodic soliloquy in the avenue—

"I wonder if she's thinking that I ought to be there too; or if I ought not, neither ought she. After all, I'm her son, and she might make a stand-up fight for me, if she would. He's fond of her, the old woman says, and proud of her, and well he may be. What's the use of it all, if she can't manage him? What fools women are! If they only could calculate at first, and take their own line from the beginning, they could manage any man. But she's afraid of him, and she lets him find it out. Well, well, it must be wretched enough for her, too. But why does she not come?"

He had to wait a little longer yet, for another quarter of an hour had elapsed before Mrs. Brookes returned.

"Is she coming?" he asked eagerly, when at length the pale-faced little woman gently entered the room.

"Yes, she is coming. She has to wait until the first lot are gone to supper. Then master will not miss her."

The old woman came up to him, and took his right hand in hers, looking fondly, but keenly, into his face, and laying the other hand upon his shoulder. "George," she said, "George, my darling boy, I hope you have not brought her bad news."

He tried to laugh as he loosened his hand, not unkindly, from the old woman's grasp.

"Do you suppose good news would have brought me here, where I am forbidden—smuggled goods?"

She shook her head sorrowfully.

"At all events, you are alive and well to tell your ill news yourself, and that is everything to her," said Mrs. Brookes.

The next moment the door opened, and Mrs. Carruthers came in with a hurried step. George Dallas started forward, and caught her in his arms.

"Mother! mother!"

"My boy, my darling boy!" were the only words spoken between them, until they were quite alone.

Mrs. Brookes left the room, and the young man was free to explain his untimely visit.

"I dread to ask what brings you here, George," said his mother, as she seated herself upon the heavy sofa, and drew him to her side. "I cannot but rejoice to see you, but I am afraid to ask you why you come."

A mingling of pleasure and apprehension shook her voice, and heightened her color.

"You may well dread to ask me, mother," replied the young man, gloomily. "You may well dread to ask what brings me, outcast as I am, to your fine home, to the place where your husband is master, and where my presence is forbidden."

"George, George!" said his mother, in a tone of grief and remonstrance.

"Well. I know it's no fault of yours, but it's hard to bear for all that, and I'm not quite such a monster as I am made out to be, to suit Mr. Carruthers' purposes. I'm not so very much worse than the young men, mother, whose step fathers, or whose own fathers either, don't find it necessary to forbid them the house. But you're afraid of him, mother, and—"

"George," said Mr. Carruthers, quietly, but sternly, "you did not come here to see me for the first time in nine months, at the risk of being turned out of Mr Carruthers' house, simply to vent your anger upon him, and to accuse me wrongfully, and taunt me with what I am powerless to prevent. Tell me what has brought you here. I can stay with you only a little while; at any moment I may be missed. Tell me what has brought you against my husband's commands, contrary to my own entreaties, though it is such a delight to me to see you even so." And the mother put her arms around the prodigal son, and kissed him fondly. Her tears were falling on his rough brown curls

"Don't cry over me, mother; I'm not worth it; I never was; and you mustn't go back to your company with pale cheeks and red eyes. There, there, it's not as bad as it might be, you know; for, as nurse says, I'm alive and well to tell it. The fact is—" He rose, and walked up and down the room in front of the sofa on which his mother was sitting, while he spoke: "The fact is, I must have money. Don't start, don't be frightened. I have not done anything very dreadful, only the consequences are nearly as fatal as if I had. I have not stolen, or forged, or embezzled property. I am not rich or respectable enough to get a chance. But I have lost a large sum at the gaming table—a sum I don't possess, and have no other means than this of getting."

"Go on," said his mother. She was deadly pale now, and her hands were tightly clasped together, as they lay on her lap, white and slender, against the rich purple of her velvet dress.

He glanced at her, quickened his step, and continued in a hard, reckless tone, but with some difficulty of utterance. "I should have been utterly ruined, but for a friend of mine, who lent me the money. Play debts must be paid, mother; and Routh, though he's not much richer than I am, would not let me be completely lost for want of a helping hand. But he had to borrow the money. He could get it lent to him. There's no one but him to lend me a shilling, and he did get it, and I had it and paid it away. But in a short time now he must pay it back, and the interest upon it. Luck has been against us both."

"Against you both, George," said Mrs. Carruthers. "Is your friend also a gambler, then?"

"Yes, he is," said Dallas, roughly; "he is a gambler. All my friends are gamblers and drunkards, and everything that's bad. What would you have? Where am I to get pious, virtuous, respectable friends? I haven't a shilling; I haven't a character. Your husband has taken care I shall have no credit. Every one knows I am disowned by Mr. Carruthers, and forbidden to show my face at Poynings: and I'm not showing it; I'm only in the servant's quarter, you see. Again he laughed, and again his mother shrank from the sound. "But though my friend is a gambler, like myself, he helps me when I want help, and inconveniences himself to do it. Perhaps that's more than respectable friends—if I had them—would do for me. It's more than I have ever known respectable friends to do for any one."

Mrs Carruthers rose, and turned her colorless face upon her son. There was an angry light in her large hazel eyes, whose dewy brightness time had not yet greatly harmed. As they confronted each other, a strong likeness between the mother and son asserted itself. "George," she said, "you are putting me to needless pain. You have said enough to show me that you are unchanged. You have come here, endangering my peace, and compromising yourself, for the purpose, I suppose, of asking me for money to repay this person who relieved you from a gambling debt. Is this your business?"

"Yes," he said, shortly, and with a lowering brow.

"Then listen to me. I cannot give you any money." He started and came close up to her. "No, George. I have no money at my disposal, and you ought to know that, as well as I know it. Every shilling I have ever had of my own, I have given you. You know I never grudged it. You know you had it all; but that leaves me without resources. Mr. Carruthers will not help you." She grew paler still, and her lips trembled. "I have asked him many times to alter his determination, a determination which you cannot say is undeserved, George, but it is in vain. I might, perhaps, wonder that you would stoop to take assistance from a man who has such an opinion of you, and who has forbidden you his house, but that the sad knowledge I have gained of such lives as yours has taught me that they utterly destroy self-respect—that a profligate is the meanest of creatures. Calm yourself. There is no use in giving loose to your temper towards me, George. You have the power to afflict me still, but you can deceive me no more."

She sat down again, wearily, leaning her arm on the back of the sofa, and her head on her hand. There was silence for a few moments. Then she said—

"How much money do you owe this man, George, and when must it be paid?"

"I owe him a hundred and forty pounds, mother, and it must be paid this day month."

"A hundred and forty pounds!" repeated Mrs. Carruthers, in a terrified tone.

"Yes; precisely that sum, and I have not a pound in the world to exist on in the mean time. I am cleaned out, that's the fact," he went on, with a dismal attempt at speaking lightly, "and I can't carry on any longer." But he spoke to inattentive ears. His mother was lost in thought.

"I cannot give you money," she said, at length. "I have not the command of any."

"This doesn't look like want of it," said her son, bitterly, as he caught a handful of her velvet dress in his grasp, and then dropped it scornfully.

"My personal expenses are all dictated by Mr. Carruthers, George, and all known to him. Don't suppose I am free to purchase dress or not, as I choose. I tell you the exact truth as I have always told you." She spoke coldly and seriously, like one whose mind is made up to a great trial, who hopes neither to alter its character nor to lessen its weight.

"I only know I must have it," he said, "or I don't see any resource for me except to cut my throat."

"No, no," returned his mother. "do not say such dreadful things. Give me time. I will try to find some way of helping you by the time you must have the money. O my boy, my boy!" She covered her face with her hands and sobbed.

George Dallas looked at her irresolutely, then came quickly towards her, and leaned over her, as she sat. "Mother," he said, in low, hurried tones,—"mother, trust me once more, little as I deserve it. Try to help me in this matter; it is life or death to me; and I will try and do better. I am sick of it all; sick of my own weakness above and more than all. But I am irretrievably ruined if I don't get this money I am quite in Routh's power and—and—I want to get out of it."

She looked up curiously at him. Something in the way he said those words at once alarmed and reassured her.

"In this man's power, George? How? To what extent?"

"I cannot tell you, mother; you would not understand. Don't frighten yourself about it. It is nothing that money cannot settle. I have had a lesson now. You shake your head—well. I know I have had many before, but I will learn from this one."

"I have not the money, George," his mother repeated. "and I cannot possibly procure it for a little time. You must not stay here."

"I know, I know," he retorted. "You need not re-echo Mr. Carruthers' interdict. I am going; but surely you can give me a little now; the price of one of these things would go a long way with me." As he spoke, he touched but with no rough hand, her earrings and the bracelet on her right arm.

"They are family jewels, or you should have them, George," Mrs. Carruthers said, in a sad voice. "Give me time, and I will make up the money for you. I have a little I can give you." She stood up and looked fixedly at him, her hands resting on his shoulder. The tall and powerful young man, with his haggard, anxious face, his hardened look, his shabby, careless dress, offered a strange contrast to the woman, whose beauty time had dealt with so slightly, and fortune so generously. Mrs. Carruthers had been a mere girl when her son was born, and probably had not been nearly so beautiful as now, when the calm dignity of position and the power of wealth lent all their attractions to her perfect face and form.

The habitual seriousness of her expression was but a charm the more, and in moments of excited feeling like the present she regained the lustrous brilliancy of the past. Searchingly, fondly, she gazed into her son's face, as though reading it for traces of the truth of his promises seeing in it but too surely indications of the weary, unsatisfying life he had led, the life which had brought disappointment to all her dearest maternal hopes. Steadily and tenderly he looked at her, a world of regret in his eyes. While they stood thus in brief silence, Mrs. Brookes came in hurriedly.

"You are wanted," she said. "Master is asking for you; he has sent Miss Clare to your room to see if you are ill."

"I must go, my boy," said Mrs Carruthers, as she hastily kissed him; and you must not stay. Come with me, Ellen, for a moment. Wait here, George, for what I promised you, and don't travel back to town without an overcoat." Then she left the room at once, the housekeeper with her. George stood where she had left him, looking towards the door.

"My dear practical mother," he said to himself, "she is as kind and as sensible as ever. Wretched about me, but remembering to desire me to buy a coat! I know she will get me the money somehow, and this shall be the last scrape I will get into. It's no use being melodramatic, especially when one is all alone, but I here make a solemn promise to myself that I will keep my promise to her."

He sat down by the fire, and remained still and thoughtful. In a few minutes Mrs. Brookes returned.

"Here's the money, Master George," she said. "I was to give it to you with my mistress' love, and she will write to you to London."

He took the folded paper from her hand. It was a ten-pound note.

"Thank you, nurse," he said; "and now I will go. I would like to stay and have a talk with you; but I had better get away, lest any annoyance should come to my mother through my staying. I'll see you when you come up to town to the fine house in Mesopotamia. Eh?"

"Lord, Master George, how you do go on! Why, Mr. Carruthers' new house is the far side of the Park."

"I know, nurse. It's all the same thing. No. No more wine, thank you, and nothing to eat. Good by. How am I to get out, though? Not through the window, and up the area wall, am I?"

"I'll show you, Master George. This way."

George Dallas buttoned his coat tightly across his breast, carefully put on his gloves, and took up his hat. As he followed Mrs. Brookes through the long stone passages of the basement story, he looked curiously about him, noting the details of comfort and convenience. "How much better off than I are my mother's servants!" he thought, idly rather than bitterly. When they reached a door which opened upon the court-yard, Mrs. Brookes bade him farewell, not without emotion.

"The great gates are open," she said. "All the servants are either in the hall or the servants' hall. None of the carriages have been called yet. You can slip past without being seen; or if any one sees you, they'll think you belong to the place."

"A serious mistake, dear old woman," said George with a half smile, as he once more shook her hand, and stepped out into the cold and darkness. A bitter sense of desolation came over him as the door closed behind him. The court yard was empty, except of carriages, and he crossed it quickly, and went through the great gates into the avenue, which swept round the terrace. Following it, he found himself brought again by a different route in front of the lighted ball room; but he did not delay to glance at the scene.

"So I am going away," he said to himself, "richer by ten pounds and my mother's promise. Stop, though! There's the sprig of myrtle. I must not forget or lose the unconscious gift of the great heiress. I wish I had asked nurse what sort of girl she is. I might have taken time to do that. It's not so cold as it was." He had been warmed and fed, and his spirits had risen. It did not take much to raise George Dallas' spirits, even now when the excesses of his wasted life were beginning to tell upon him. "I feel quite strong again. The night is lighter; the village must be a wretched place. I have a great mind to push on to Amherst. It's only seven miles, and Carruthers can't hear that I have been there; but he might hear of me at the village, and bother my mother about it."

He took his way down the avenue and reached the gate, which lay open. One feeble light twinkled from the upper window of the lodge gate. Bulger and family had retired to rest, the excitement of the arrivals being over; and Bulger would leave the gate to take care of itself until morning. Unquestioned, unseen, George Dallas left Poynings, and, turning to the right under the park wall, set forth at a steady pace towards Amherst.

The town of Amherst is very much like the other towns in that part of the country. Close by the railway station lies the Railway Tavern, snug and comfortable, with a "quick draught" of home brewed ale and bitter beer, thanks to the powers of suction of porters, guards, and admiring friends of both, who vent their admiration in "standing glasses round." Not a little of its custom does the Railway Tavern owe to that small plot of waste ground in front of it, where, even on this desolate night, you might trace the magic circle left by the "ring" of Signor Quagliasco's Mammoth Circus on its visit last autumn, and the holes for the pole and tent-pegs, and the most recent ruts which were left by the wheels of the cart of the travelling photographer who "took" the entire town at Christmas, and, in addition to the photograph, presented each sitter with a blue card embossed with a scarlet robin bearing in its mouth the legend, "A happy new year to you." Then come the ordinary lot of butchers, bakers, tailors, hosiers, grocers and chemists, shops and dwellings: then the old gray church, with its square ivy-covered tower, its billowy graves and its half-obliterated sun-dial over the porch, and then the fresh green fields again.

George Dallas, in the morning early, left the bed he had procured at the inn, called in at the station and learned from the friendly porter when the next train would start for London, and where he could find a tailor's shop and walked briskly through the little town, with feelings very different to those which had possessed him on his first arrival at the Amherst station. Now, his step was free and light, he carried his head erect, and though he occasionally shivered as the cold wind came sweeping over the downs and gave him a sharp, unfriendly nip as it hurried by him in its progress to the sea, he bore the insult with tolerable fortitude, and seemed to derive immediate comfort from plunging his hand into his trousers-pocket, where lay the ten pound note he had received from his mother. It was there, stiff and crisp to his touch. He had taken it out and looked at it twice or thrice on the road, but he could not do that now in the town; he must content himself with touching it, and the crinkling sound was music in his ear; he had been so long without money, that he derived the keenest pleasure from the possession of this actual tangible sum, and felt so little inclined to part with it, that, though he had passed, and noticed in passing, the tailor's shop to which he had been recommended by the porter, he still walked on. It was not until he had made a circuit of the old churchyard at the end of the town, where even on summer days the wind is generally at play, and where on winter nights it ramps rages in a manner terrible to hear and feel, that George Dallas began to comprehend the necessity of at once procuring some warmer clothing, and, turning back, made straight for the tailor's shop.

A neat, clean looking shop, with "Evans, Tailor," painted over the window, the effect being slightly spoiled by the knob of the roller blind, which formed a kind of a full stop in the middle of the word "Tailor," and divided it into two unequal portions; with "Evans, Tailor," blazing from its brass door-plate: with "Evans, Tailor," inscribed with many twisted flourishes on its wire blind, where it emerged coyly from "Liveries" preceding it and took hasty refuge in "Uniforms" at its conclusion. Evans himself behind the counter, a fat, chubby, rosy little man, with clustering iron gray hair round his temples, and a bit of round scalp wig fitting, like the lid of a teapot, into a bald place on his crown. Apparently he had been all his life tailoring to such an extent for other people as to have had no time to attend to himself, for he stood behind the counter this winter's night in his shirtsleeves, and without his coat.

The old man bowed as George Dallas entered the shop, and asked him what they could do for him. Dallas replied that he wanted a warm, thick overcoat, "if they'd got such a thing."

"Such a thing! Well, there may be such a thing perhaps, but I'm not certain, not being an article kept in stock," replied Mr. Evans, "which is mostly tarpaulin for the railway guards and stokers, likewise canal boatmen, which is often customers. A warm, thick overcoat," repeated the old man, "is a article generally made to order, though I've a sort a recollection of a something of the kind returned on our hands in consequence of the party which was staying at the Lion having left promiscuous. Let me see!" he continued, opening two or three drawers. "I ain't so young as I was, sir, and I'm touched in the wind; and this nasty gas which we've only had this winter don't do for me, making me bust out in sudden prusperation. Ho! I thought so! Here's a warm thick overcoat, blue Witney, lined with plaid; that's a article I can recommend; our own make; we ain't ashamed of it, you see!" and he pointed to a label stitched inside just below the collar, where the inevitable "Evans, Tailor," in gilt letters, was supplemented by the address, "Amherst."

George Dallas took the coat and slipped it on. It fitted tolerably, and was thick and warm. "What is the price?" he asked.

"We can do that for you at fifty-three and six," said the old man. "It was a three-pounder, that coat was, when made for the party at the Lion, but we'll make a reduction now. Fifty three and six, and our own make. You couldn't do better."

"I dare say not," said Dallas, absently. "Please to change this for me."

At the sight of the bank-note Mr. Evan's pleasant face became a little clouded. He did not relish the notion of changing notes for persons with whom he had no previous acquaintance. But after he had taken the note in his hand and held it between his eyes and the light, and flattened it out on the counter, his cheerful expression returned, and he said, "All right, sir. I'll change it and welcome! I know where you got this note, sir! Ah, you may start, but I do! You got it from our postoffice, lower down the street; here's the postoffice stamp on it, which they're compelled to put on every note passing through their hands. Look, "Amherst, B. 1, Jan." Thank you, sir; six and six's, three and seven is ten; thank you, sir!" and the old man, having counted the change from a cashbox in a desk at the back of the shop, hurried round to open the door and bow his customer out.

Within half an hour George Dallas was in the train on his return to London.

"S'pose He Should Bust."—Lord Grosvenor, eldest son and heir of the Marquis of Westminster, the richest man in England, while in this country, at the West was once waiting at a country station for a tardy train, when one of the farmers of the neighborhood entered into conversation with him. "Been about these parts consid'able, stranger?" "Yes, for some length of time." "Like 'em pretty well, eh?" "Yes, pretty well." "How long have yer bin here?" "A few weeks." "What's yer business?" "I have no business." "What are you travelliu' for, then?" "Only for my own pleasure." "Don't yer do any business? How do you get yer livin' then?" "It isn't necessary for me to work for my support. My father is a man of property and gives me an allowance sufficient for my wants." "But s'pose the old man should die?" "In that case I daresay he'd leave us enough to live upon." "But s'pose he should bust up?" Here the conversation ended, and Lord Grosvenor walked away, evidently pleased by a new idea, and one which had never been presented to him until then.—Boston Post.

"Cholera Cigar" is the last notion of the tobacconists of London. The cigars are "prepared with opium;" and, as opium eaters never suffer from cholera, smokers of the cigars will be exempt from the epidemic, at least, so say the traders.

Austria lost 80,000, and Prussia 35,000 men in the late war.

"EXPERIENCE."

"I LIKE experience, though, howe'er it tells,
For, or against me; all is one at last,
These hearts of ours are like to soundless wells,
Wherein the shining pearls of truth are cast:
And very happy he who rightly spells
The sweet and bitter lessons of the Past;
For only thus he comes himself to know,
Which all his knowledge is—as Pope will show.

"I like experience, therefore. I have had
My share of blows and bruises; but I think—
Let it be good, indifferent, or bad—
The 'wine of life' 's a very decent drink.
Yet, if a man lives on, and don't run mad,
When, finally, he pauses on the brink
Of death, I judge, though certain people threat it,
The wagers are that he will not regret it.

"I love this self dissection; for I woo
All knowledge, and this process finds it out.
I love to judge between the false and true;
Blow off the dust of romance and of doubt;
Break error's crust and let the sunlight through!
Ope mystery's doors; give bigotry the knout:
I love the good, the beautiful, the great,
And all the noblest hopes in man's estate.

"I love to laugh, likewise I love to sneer;
Am fond of pleasure, nor averse to pain.
I have found wisdom, sometimes, in a tear;
I have been gay and sad, and gay again.
I love my sorrows, though they've cost me dear;
I love my dinner, but did not complain
When I had none, which sometimes was the case;
For even that may be a means of grace."

THE NILE AND ITS TRIBUTARIES.

SIR SAMUEL W. BAKER, the knighted Nile explorer, lately read a paper on the "Abyssinian Tributaries to the Nile." Sir Samuel commenced by reference to the general and historic interest which had always attached to the Nile, and been participated in by every class of people; there had been a wonder and a mystery about it which was now cleared up. Down to the Mediterranean from El Damer, where it was joined by the Atbara, it flowed 1200 miles through deserts without a single tributary. Further south it was joined by the Blue Nile at Kartum. Further south still the main stream, or White Nile, had now been traced up to the great lakes on the Equator, the Victoria and Albert Nyanza, as the actual source. Without dwelling upon personal adventures, already published, but limiting himself to an exposition of the geographical problem, he briefly recounted how he spent a year in following up the course of the Atbara river, and afterwards descending the Blue Nile to Kartum. These were for nine months of the year perfectly dry channels. But in the three months corresponding with the annual inundation of the Nile they were suddenly flooded into torrents, 500 yards or more in width draining the rich lands of Abyssinia, carrying down the mud deposit to Lower Egypt, and accounting both for the inundations and the rainfall. All the tributaries of the Nile, which first gathered themselves into the Blue Nile and the Atbara, flowed in a direction from the southeast to the northeast, while the White Nile came up almost due north from the lakes. Without these lakes it was certain that Egypt would be annihilated as a habitable country. From the Albert Nyanza the Nile flowed in its full volume, a giant in its birth and obtained its greatest flood at the junction with the Blue Nile, being thence gradually lessened in its course to the sea by the evaporation and absorption of the deserts. It was sweetened by the admixture of the waters of Abyssinia, while south of Kartum it flowed through marshes, and, being charged with vegetable matter, it was unwholesome to the taste. Sir Samuel described his joyful meeting with Grant and Speke as they came up from the south, and acknowledged the obligations under which he lay to them, without which he doubted whether he should have succeeded in his object. They had left a character behind them of which he reaped the advantage, and Speke gave him instructions, and also the map, which was afterwards published in England, showing his conjecture that the Nile, after first issuing from the Victoria Nyanza, took a turn to the west into the Albert; but Grant and Speke were unable to follow it, on account of the state of warfare among the natives. For two years Sir Samuel toiled and labored down to the great lakes to verify the convictions of Speke, who told him when they parted that he had no doubt, on getting home to England, he should find persons who knew very little about the Thames, and a little about the Trent, ready to contradict his assertions as to the source of the Nile. Sir Samuel expressed the opinion that there were no connection between the Albert Lake and the Tanganika, further south. The table land between them was 5,000 feet above the level of the sea, and the mountains rose 7,000 feet above that, and it was most possible that this same region which was the water-shed for the Nile to the north, would be the water shed for the other lake to the south. In concluding, he said there had been only one reason for regret on his reaching home, and that was to find that no Government recognition had been bestowed on Speke. But if he received no title, he had left a name that would be remembered when no title survived.

"SNAP," SMITH'S DOG.

"SNAP."

"Beneath this sod lies "SNAP," Smith's dog.
Born (precise date unknown.)
Died: November 8, 1861.
Peace to his bones!"
[Here follow five hieroglyphics, which, for want of a font of Chinese type we are obliged to omit.]

SUCH is the heading of the lamented "Snap's" tombstone, made of the top of an antiqnated tea-box. The exact meaning of the signs at the end of this brief epitah, I am not, in the absence of Mr. Carvalho, prepared to give. but suppose they were put there by the Celestial who first used the box, and were intended to iuform the public that the tea contained therein was of first quality, and "velly cheap." This, however, is a mere conjecture fonnded on my knowledge of the mendacious character of Chinamen in general, a Chinaman engaged in the tea business iu particular. Let us, however, return to the subject of this brief notice, the late Snap, Smith's Dog. The sagacions reader has already surmised that I am Smith, and that the defunct quadruped, whose name figures at the head of this page, belonged to me.

In the brief testimonial which I intend offering to the deceased Snap, I shall take care to adhere strictly to the truth, not allowing my feeliogs to lead me into any undeserved eulogism on the character of my departed canine. Nor is it my intention to err in the other extreme—to lay too great a stress in the faults of him, who, though the nearest perfect of his race, was not altogether immaculate. Naught extenuating and naught setting down in malice, I shall take up the thread of his life at the time when I first knew him, and following him through its exciting events, shall leave him at last sleeping calmly two feet under ground, with his tea-board and its glowing hireoglyphics above him.

It was in a small Swiss roadside inn that I first saw Snap. He was engaged at the time extracting nourishment from the maternal breast, in company with several of his brothers, nameless pups, whose only claim to fame is comprised in their relationship to the subject of this memoir. The enormous head and waggish expression of the animal struck me forcibly. His expansive brow gave sign of great intelligence; while the curling of his upper lip whenever one of his young brothers encroached in his domain, which gave to his physiognomy an eminently unpleasant and don't-tread-on-my-tail expression, showed that he was not wanting in personal courage. He pleased my fancy and I bought him at once for thirty francs in current coin. By dint of jerking at the twine, which had beeu attached to his neck, I finally induced him to leave his mother and brothers. With profound pain I am forced to acknowledge that no member of his family seemed at all sadly affected by his departure; on the contrary, the sensations of his relatives appeared to be rather pleasurable than otherwise, for they wagged their tales gleefully and betook themselves with renewed vigor to their former occupation. Ard now I first became acquaioted with one of the most promiuent traits of my biographer's character, namely: a stern, uncompromising determination not to do what he was wanted to do. He no sooner understood that I desired him to follow me than he stuck out all four legs and refused to budge. Entreaties with a dog of his stamp were vain; so I was reduced to the disagreeable necessity of dragging him three miles through mud and dust, he protestiog all the way. It is due to him to state that at the end of the jonrney he was still the same, only a little dirtier.

Though young, his character had obtained a prodigious development. His ideas on the subject of beef were perfectly lucid and correct. A descendant on the mother's side of the celebrated house of Bull, he was addicted to biting in a general way, and was contemptuously indifferent as to whether his teeth were inserted into a leg of the table or of a student lodger. On the whole, however, he rather preferred the back of our landlady's little boy; and I am sorry to state that on his first appearance at our hangout he made that youngster squawl so vociferously as to rouse the whole square in which we lived. The remarks made to me on that occasion by our hostess, were not of a particularly eulogistic character, but as I was somewhat in arrears at the time for board, lodging, etc., and not in a condition to "pay my bill clear out" in accordance with her kind suggestion, I concluded to let the whole affair glide into oblivion.

As soon as it was known by the other American students living in the house that I had a dog they resolved to baptise him. We did not long hesitate about a name. Pouring a few drops of beer on the pup's head, Watson Fuchs, Major of the corpse Tigorinia, proclaimed that Smith's Dog should be known as Snapem, or Snap. Whenever the exigencies of the occasion should render it inconvenient or unadvisable to address him by his full name, he added that any one knowing of any satisfactory reasons why the animal should not be called Snapem, must state them then, or be silent forever. As no reasons satisfactory or otherwise were produced to the contrary, the pup had conferred on him a name—by which he shall henceforth be kuown in this memoir—aud a local habitation in the tea-box in the corner—that tea-box which was destined to become his coffin.

Had I the time and space I would tell of the war which soon sprang up between the lodgers and landlady on account of the amiable Snapem. I would show how the estimable but rather excitable lady was compelled to indorse the presence of the equally estimable, but by no means less excitable, quadruped. I would tell how the tempting morsel of meat which she kindly left in the dear dog's way was missed by him and devoured by her favorite porker, who expired two hours afterwards in a paroxysm of squeals; how the persistency with which she endeavored to entice Snap with a lump of sugar to the brink of a rather deep sewer in the back yard, was not rewarded by success; and how, in short, many other tentatives io his life were frustrated by the vigilance and acuteness of the illustrious animal. But these details, however interesting they might be to the appreciative few, as giving an insight into the character of the lamented Snap, would, I fear, afford little pleasure to the public at large, whose yearning is more for amusement than for instruction. I will not therefore dwell upon them, but will pass on to another of Snap's peculiarities—a peculiarity proper to all men of genius—Snap snored.

It has been my fortune to be brought continually into contact with celebrated persons—whether this is owing to the fact of my being somewhat in that line myself, or is the result of mere chance, modesty forbids my specifying. I have my own opinion on the subject, but let that pass—at any rate I have met great men everywhere—in railway cars, in the stages crossing Mt. Cenis and the Simplon, in double, triple, quadruple bedded rooms of small Swiss Auberges, (the geninses, by the way generally had the beds, and I slept on the floor) and they all snored. The greater the genius of a man, the greater is his power to produce hideous sounds through the medium of his nose. Note the fact, reader; it is worthy of deep thought. For my part, I do not pretend to understaod the philosophy of this plenomenon, and recommend it to the attention of learned societies. Snap's snoring was not of that regular character which betokens peaceful slumber and rosy dreams; his breathing was not of that slow measured kind which tells of a healthy body and an untroubled conscience; not his, the calm sleep of an honest dog who, having done his whole daily duty in the way of worrying cats and Chinamen, wanders in spirit along ways fenced in with marrow-bones—a sort of dog elysium where fleas cease from troubling and weary canines are at rest. Far different from this was Snap's perturbed repose. What fearful visions haunted his slumbers, what hideous forms stalked through the mazes of his dreams, extorting from him the diabolical noises to which he incessantly gave vent, it is impossible to coojecture; but be the causes what they may, the snoring of Snap was somethiug excruciating. First would come hall a dozen snorts, following each other in quicker and quicker succession, and concluding with an unearthly growl. Then after a brief interval several fierce snaps, some mere growls, a grunt and a yell, which last would generally wake him up. What was the cause ol these startling demonstrations? Was he waging war in dreams with vengeful cats; or was it fleas? These questions remained unanswered up to the last day of his valuable life.

It is lamentable that in writing the biographies of great men—and the same remark applies to those of great dogs—much even of the best known lives must be left entirely to conjecture. Editors are almost as open to the reproach as biographers. Thus in that passage of Julius Cæsar where Brutus indignantly denies that Cassius is a better man than himself, editors tamely render the illustrious Roman's remark thus. "Go to; you're not Cassius"—while it is more than probable that the Bard of Avon wrote it originally in this way: "Go to——; you're not Cassius," pointing out in a delicate, but at the same time sufficiently marked manner, the locality which the lean Roman was requested to visit. A little further on we see the sentence: "Away tight man," robbed of all its emphasis, if not of its entire meaning by the arbitrary changing of the word "tight" into slight." The "Is't possible" with which the boozy Cassius responds to Brutus' accusation strengthening this view of the case and gives us to understand that a glimmeriug suspicion that he is not in a state of complete sobriety, has been awakened in his maddened brain. I have cited these passages to show that the efforts of our biographers and editors are at least little more than mere guess work—and a very pitiful guess-work it sometimes is.

About this time another of Snap's peculiarities became prominent. Lying perfectly still in one corner of the room, he would, without any apparent provocation, rise and dart franticly over to the other side, snap his teeth viciously, growl, and then return to his former position. His conduct was unexplained until one day I noticed him eyeing an all unconscious fly who was crawling up the wall some ten feet from where the watchful Snap lay. There was a rush, a snort, a scream from Steiner, Jr., aged six, and the luckless insect had been drowned. The second day after I bought him I began giving my pnp half a glass of beer per diem, which allowance was increased as he grew older. The result of this wise treatment was soon perceptible. He commenced to swell. His voice became a deep bass. Judging only from his hoarse barking one would have taken him for a dog of many summers. It was striking, to say the least, to hear a deep hoarse roar issuing from the month of an animal some six inches high.

Above my room was a garret—a council chamber in which the rats of the house discussed questions of general interest, and clawed each other like men every night. My opportunities for studying the habits of these interesting animals, both in peace and in war, were numerous, for I could scarcely have heard them better had they held their somewhat boisterous meetings on the floor of my room. Sleep, under snch circumstances, was difficult; so one night we locked Snap in the garret and retired. Now it happened that the repeated protestations of the students, four of whom, not including myself, slept in the same étage, had finally induced Madame Steiner to take some decided step in the matter, so the same night she had placed her favorite cat, a large hairy creature with a proportionately broad tail, in the garret. Snap, like most great characters, was magnanimous. He had few prejudices but those he had were of the most violent. He had a prejudice against Madame Steiner and son, and also against bit cigars. He disliked tobacco smoke, especially, when blown into his eyes; bnt above all, and most of all, he detested cats. About midnight I was awakened by a succession of shrill yells, followed by something that resembled a squawk, if I may be allowed to use the word.

"He's got them rats," cried Jenkins, excitedly, from next door. I drowsily surmised that he had. Next came a terrific scratching, then a wild chase across the roof, a hoarse growl, and three or four screeches.

"That rat's catchiug it! from Jenkins. Then I sank again to sleep.

The next morning I heard the step of a person, evidently slightly corpulent and suffering from shortness of breath, mounting the stair. The puffing noise which accompanied the step, convinced me that it was our worthy hostess visiting our étage. But the worthy lady did not halt before our rooms as I supposed she would; on the contrary, she went higher up and opened the door of the garret.

"Kibir," she cried peremptorily, "Kibir, komm." Jndging from the silence that ensued, Kibir, Madame Steiner's gigantic cat, declined to obey.

"Kibir," a key higher, "bist doo, da?" A hoarse growl was the only audible answer.

"Get ont you little beast!" retorted Madame, angrily, and then "Kibir! pretty little Kibir! come then! come to its mistress! Oh-h-h! What! what is it? Steiner, husband, run here! Oh you wretched little beast! Let me kill him! Steineer! you lazy idiot, are you coming? Bring your gun! Run, ruu! Ach! my poor murdered Kibir!

I was wide awake now.

"What's the row?" inquired Jenkin's in his room next to mine of some one in the regions above.

An answer iu the voice of Watson Fuchs, Major, came shortly back.

"Row!" By George, Smith's in for it! Snap's chawed Kibir all to pieces, and the old woman"—by this familiar title he generally designated Madame S—' is going into him like fury."

"Burschen heraus!" screamed Jenkins franticly from below, "Snap's in bodily danger. Students, to the rescue!" There was a terrific slamming of doors along the passage in answer to this excited appeal. and I judged that my frieuds and Snap's were leaping out of bed and into their boots with as much alacrity as they could master.

"Fritz—Hans! come here, they are killing Steiner. You touch him agaio and I'll scratch your eyes out, you-u-u-u—!" This from onr hostess.

"Bruschen to the rescue!" bawled Jenkins in response, rushing from his room—"Danger to Snap! Watson forever,—hurrah!"

"We are coming, mistress," from below.

"We are coming, Corpsbursch," from all the rooms in the house.

I leapt franticly out of bed, wound a dressing gown hurriedly around me, and in a moment was in the gallery. Herr Steiner, our respected host, was sitting on the floor and endeavoring to stem with a not exactly immaculate pocket handkerchief a copious flow of that fluid, the extracting of which from the nose of a foe, affords such unmitigated satisfaction to an American or English student. Madame Steiner entwined with her fair arm the neck of her discomfited lord, and with the other lifted on high she seemed to invoke vengeance on the head of Watson, who, with his back against a large box, and his fists in boxing posture, was swearing uproariously, and protesting in execrable German, his readiness to thrash the whole shop, "supernumeraries included."

A council of students was held in my room, at which Snap was present. As a pacifying measure, it was proposed that we should all attend the funeral of the deceased Kibir, in procession, that every possible respect should be shown to his memory, consistent with a due regard for the feelings of the susceptible Snapem. It was also resolved, that, although for the character of Snap, Smith's Dog, we entertain a most exalted opinion, we are not prepared to justify completely, his conduct in destroying the cat, Kibir. But, as we are totally unacquainted with the details of the lamentable affair, we decline expressing any decided judgment upon it. These resolutions were rendered into German and forwarded to Madame Steiner.

That same evening the unhappy Snap jerked off the table-cloth, buried himself beneath a mass of beef and potatoes, and there he lay and growled. He subsequently tore down a window-curtain, chased Steiner, Jr. up three pair of stairs, and returned to our smoking-room with a long slit of that youth's pants between his teeth. He laid this trophy gently at my feet, crawled under my chair, and began sleeping and snoring simultaneously.

On the following day, we all attended the funeral of the ill-fated Kibir. The grave was dug in the back yard. Snap followed decorously, and demonstrated his respect for the deceased by allowing a piece of black crape to be attached to the end of his tail. He advanced slowly to the brink of the grave, glanced down, snuffed uneasily at the remains of Kibir, which were lying on their bier by the side of the hole, and then, standing, so to speak, on his tail, he elevated his snout and howled lugubriously. Was it remorse for his rash deed, or a vague presentiment that he must soon follow his victim into the canine and feline spirit land, that caused that mournful wail? Quien sabe?

Shortly afterwards he went to sleep, and, as usual, snored diabolically. The ceremony over, we repaired to our smoking-room.

That night, Snap was very gay. His spirit always was wonderfully elastic. He ran around in circles chasing his tail, and barking gleefully. His barks seemed to mean, "I cooked Kibir's goose; glad of it, too—very glad." He carried this spirit of fun into one of the most serious occupations of his life, the pursuit of flies. He would creep up on one of his tormentors with an expectant grin on his face, and would snap him off a wall or table-leg with an appearance of the greatest relish. Finally, he curled himself up at my feet and went to sleep.

At breakfast, the day after Kibir's funeral, Jenkins asked, "Why, where the deuce is Snap?"

We called and whistled, and at last I spied something black and white under a chair.

"Is that you, Snap, my boy?" I inquired. "Come here, sir, at once. Slowly and painfully the little fellow crawled towards me, and when he had reached the spot where I sat he licked my foot, gave a faint sigh, laid his head upon the floor and was still. I called him again. For the first time in his life he gave no grateful look, no pleasant wag of his tail in answer to a kind word from his master's lips. Snap was dead.

We wrapped him in his blanket, dug his grave in the back yard, and then we carried Snap out and buried him.

His presence would never again disturb the cats in their mournful concerts—his deep roar would never again strike terror into their feline revels. For Snap was dead. Peace to his memory. May happiness and bones attend him in that spirit land whose boundaries he had crossed so soon.

Farewell, a long farewell to Snap!

Thus ended Watson's orison funebre, and thus ends the history of the defunct Snap, Smith's Dog. Above his grave stands out in bold relief the top of the the box, on which is recorded his name and the date of his decease. To his memory this somewhat long but still imperfect tribute is paid by the now hapless Smith, of whom he was whilom the dog.

AMUSEMENTS.

THE flattering success of Miss Alice Kingsbury at the Opera House, is one of the most remarkable events in our city's dramatic history, and one that must swell the heart as well as the purse of this emotional little favorite. There is so much of nature and so little of art apparent in her characterizations, that her popularity can only be explained by the old saw about one touch of nature making the world akin. The three or four characters Miss Kingsbury has assumed so far are evidently favotite ones, and exhibit her poetic temperament and natural susceptibility to a remarkable degree. She enters into the feeling of the part with all the earnestness of a poet, and exhibits a real conscientious emotion in the rendering of it, con amore, and not in accordance with the rules and requirements of art solely. It is this exhibition of feeling and sensibility in its various transitions, that wins and impresses her audiences. She does not directly appeal to the intellect; but it is the hearts and sentiments of her auditors that are touched and awakened to a responsive appreciation.

This afternoon the Pearl of Savoy is to be produced for the Kingsbury matinée. For this evening's entertainment, The Hidden Hand will be shown for the first time with Miss Kingsbury in the leading part.

METROPOLITAN THEATRE.—On Saturday evening, Crispino was performed, to a moderately full house, the audience being somewhat lessened by rumors during the day to the effect that some other opera would be substituted, or that no performance at all would be given; the uncertainty arose from a circumstance not within the control of the management. Rigoletto was produced on Monday, with tolerable success, although the title character was but feebly and clumsily executed by Signor Mancusi, and M'lle Tourny's "Maddalena" partook somewhat of burlesque; Signor Bianchi was, however, remarkably effective in the part of the "Duke," and Signor Milleri sustained that of "Sparafucile" with his usual power and correctness; while Signorina Brambilla, as "Gilda," achieved one of her greatest triumphs, the music being singularly adapted to her voice and style; she was warmly encored in the beautiful "Caro nome," and was frequently and heartily applauded throughout the performance.

On Wednesday evening the season came to an end, the occasion being a benefit to Mr. Crowly, and the programme comprising two acts from La Juive, several scenes from Lucrezia, and the music lesson scene from Il Barbiere, besides dancing and gymnastics by the Siegrist family, and some operatic selections by the Second Artillery Band.

Forty-seven performances have been given by this troupe, including forty-six representations of complete operas, besides single acts or scenes on several occasions. We believe that the management will find itself not only without loss, but with an actual, though very modest, surplus in the treasury; and this fact alone affords great reason for congratulation, being quite contrary to previous experience in California, and indicating that our community is at length both able and willing to render to the expensive and hazardous enterprise of Italian Opera, a cordial and remunerative support.

In reviewing the season, we find little cause for dissatisfaction with the members of the troupe. Signor Bianchi has sustained an amount of labor which would have completely exhausted any tenor less robust; and although often apparently suffering from fatigue, has never spared himself, nor disappointed the public. Signorina Brambilla is entitled to equal praise, for faithful attention and unfailing good will; she has fixed herself more firmly than ever in the affections of our music-loving people, and has displayed constant and rapid improvement as an artist. Signor Milleri, who immediately established himself as the finest basso who ever visited this coast, has also proved, during his three months' engagement, that he is a capable artist, with a disposition always willing to assist the management and his fellow artist in their labors; should a future season bring him again to San Francisco, he may be sure of a cordial and hearty welcome. We regret to say that the record of Signor Mancusi by no means entitles him to such favorable notice. Of his artistic attainments we have often spoken in high praise, and have nothing to recall, although his "Don Giovanni," and "Rigoletto" were far below the level of his earlier efforts. But there are facts (heretofore suppressed in order to prevent any open rupture which might prematurely end the season) discreditable to him, and we cannot in justice bestow on him the parting good words of commendation that we so willingly give to his brother artists. The subordinate members of the troupe have labored faithfully, and deserve great credit, with the single exception of M'lle Tourny, whose unfortunate remissness to her duties has greatly weakened her chances of success in San Francisco.

In spite of these drawbacks and embarrassments, the season has been not only financially self sustaining, but has proved an important and gratifying step in the development of musical culture in our young community. We trust, however, that the lovers of Italian Opera will not suffer the impetus thus gained to exhaust itself, but will soon unite their forces in a movement to encourage another and even more successful season. The Italian Opera Association, organized some months' ago, affords the nucleus for such a movement, and its influence has been already perceptible, inasmuch as the arrangements for the past season, though initiated by the management, would hardly have been consummated except for the moral support guaranteed by the officers and members of the Association.

THE HOWSON ENGLISH OPERA TROUPE.—On Wednesday, October 24th, Miss Emma and Miss Clelia Howson, the young and talented soprano and contralto of the Howson English Opera Troupe, will take their first benefit in California; a splendid bill will be presented on this occasion. During the period of the suspension of the regular performances at the Metropolitan, preparations will be made for the production of the opera of "Cinderella," by the Howson troupe.

SIGNOR CARMINI MORLEY'S BENEFIT.—On Thursday, Oct. 25th, Signor Carmini Morley bids adieu to the San Francisco public at the Academy of Music. This will be almost the very last Italian Opera performance—Signorina Brambilla, Signor Milleri, and Signor Mancusi have kindly volunteered, and will appear in "Lucia di Lamermoor."

MONS. RONCOVIERI announces his benefit at the Metropolitan on Friday night next, with a strong host of volunteers.

WOODWARD'S GARDEN.—Scores of ladies and children have daily visited this—the most beautiful place of resort in California—during the present week. Besides the usual attractions on the grounds, quite a menagerie, consisting of a camel, lions, bears, elk, deer, and many other smaller animals, have been added, which will remain on exhibition during the coming week.

How I Managed my Children from Infancy to Marriage—By Mrs. Warren, author of "How I Managed my House on £200 a Year."

This little volume seems to have enjoyed an immense popularity, twenty thousand copies having been sold within a twelve month after its publication. We think the headings of a few of the chapters will furnish a better idea of the character of the book, than a column of disquisition. The following are specimens: "Trial with a first baby—Infants food—How to increase a child's sufferings when cutting its teeth—The treatment of infants when sick—The croup and its treatment—Teaching infants to walk—How their legs become crooked—Nervous children—The whooping cough—Its medical treatment and diet—Early education—History—Geography—Spelling—Grammar—Girls at school—Music lessons." The volume tells in minute detail how a thoughtful and judicious mother reared eight children, carrying them through the physical and moral perils of infancy and childhood. For sale at A. Roman & Co's.

MEAGHER, TAAFFE & Co. advertise in our columns the opening of their fall importations of the new style of silks and dress goods, cloaks, shawls, etc.,—an extensive catalogue of which may be found on our sixteenth page. It reads like some great Fashion Report.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No. 2.

"MEDICINE CHESTS always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents.

To the famous Dr. Abernethy is accredited the remark that there are three classes of sick persons, viz: those who think they are sick; those whose friends think they are sick, and those who really are sick—and that the latter generally die. The "laying on of hands" does not seem to reach those cases.

"The science [?] of medicine," says Dr. John Mason Good, "has been cultivated more than two thousand years. The most devoted industry and the greatest talents have been exercised upon this subject; yet upon no subject has the wild spirit of imagination been more widely displayed than in the history of medicine." He adds, "We know nothing of the cause of disease." This, be it remembered, is from one of the disciples of medicine of the present century.

"To harmonize the contrarieties of medical doctrines," exclaims Prof. Chapman, "is, indeed, a task as impracticable as to arrange the fleeting vapors around us, or to reconcile the fixed and repulsive antipathies of nature."

MESMERISM IN THE CURE OF DISEASE; or, as it is now termed, "Laying on of hands." This means of relieving the sick and curing slight nervous or "hypo" affections has been practiced in this city for many years; but alone, the cures will not stay cured as a rule, if the affection is at all serious. What's the trouble? After getting "cured" go to Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, and he will keep you cured, by his common sense means and ideas.

"I wish I could be sure I have not killed more than I cured;" and "I have no faith in physic," after forty years practice, said Dr. Bailhe.

"BATHS expressly adapted to the new style of curing disease, by Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. It is well known that in Eastern climes, where magnetism, or mesmerism, was first discovered, steam bathing followed as a sequence, and in those climes, more than in any other portion of the globe, has steam bathing been as familiar to the people as household words It is just as necessary here, and the new "curees" will find that they will not stay cured without them.

Dr. Lentand declares "it is so impossible to separate the useful from the trivial in medical literature that it were better to reject all."

MORE than fourteen years a resident of San Francisco—intelligently, zealously, and honorably engaged in the performance of his duties as a water-cure physician—Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, has made for references, hundreds of our best and most prominent citizens; and here upon the coast, where the term "water-cure" was comparatively unknown, he has the proud satisfaction to know that he has made thousands of converts to his views and adherents of his improved practice, and that water cure in his hands is a recognized and popular branch of the healing art, which the people sustain.

DR. TRALL writes, "There is no common agreement in the testimony of medical men respecting the indications of the most common disease, nor the properties or operative effects of the most common articles of the materia medica."

SCIENTIFIC STEAM BATHING.—It is a settled fact that there is no means for relieving acute or chronic disease like proper steam bathing. Dr. Bourne, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, is the only scientific and thoroughly experienced administerer of steam baths, and his baths are as unlike Russian or Digger Indian style as are molehills and mountains.

"THAT the medical profession has not realized the world's expectation, is lamentably true," says the Hospital committee, (all allopathic doctors,) of the California Legislature of 1853.

POISON OAK.—A few words from "Boston," editor of the San Diego Herald, 1858. He gives his experience in POISON OAK: "If any one of our readers should be so unfortunate as to come in contact with this poisonous plant and get a 'swelled head,' as we did a few months since, we advise them to go immediately to Dr. BOURNE'S water cure establishment, and he will steam it out of the system in a few hours, or a day at farthest, if attended to immediately. He cured us in 'double quick time,' and we 'had it bad.'"

DR. BEACH asks, "Is it not as dangerous to employ one of our regular mineral and butchering doctors as it is to 'jump into the dock, take poison, or to hazard life in any other way?' And may we not regard such practice among the same calamities as pestilence, earthquake, or famine?"

WATCHING AHEAD.

AN ENGINE-DRIVER'S STORY.

A MAN can do anything a'most, if he likes to persevere. Here am I, Henry Smith, driver o' the express engine, "Swift Flash," on the Great South Northern Railway, with good pay, and what I like next, plenty o' confidence put in you.

T'other day—it don't seem more, though it's years ago—I sat on one side o' the fire, looking werry hard at it, and the missus sat on t'other side, also looking werry hard at it; and both on us putting it to the blush, and keeping it warm, for it did precious little o' that to us, for coals was high and money was scarce. It was the depth o' winter, and a miserable scrap o' fire at the bottom o' the grate made one feel dumpy, you know.

Well, Ann sat o' one side, and I sat on t'other, for it seemed to me tc be no use running about wearing out shoe-leather; so by way of a joke, just to cheer her up, I says, "Don't put the fire out, my girl," for I could see there was a tear or two ready to drop.

That did it; for before I knew where I was, she was down on her knees with her head in my lap, crying that bitterly that you'd have thought she'd have broke her heart, and along o' my bit o' stupid banter. I knowed it was no use to say any thing then, so I lets her have her cry out, and then, when the sobs only came sometimes, as she nestled up close to me I took her up in my arms and laid her on the bed, and made her as warm as I could, poor lass; for she'd no business to have been up, and if she'd been some one else's wife there'd have been the doctor coming every day, and ordering of her port wine, and jellies, and things which I couldu't get for her.

"Where are you going, Harry?" she says.

"'Nother try at the rail," I says.

"No, no!" she says; "not there. Don't go there, Harry; you know I shall have no peace for thinking of the danger from the engines. I dreamed last night you was brought home dead."

"Come, none of that," I says, laughing—least-wise it was about half-way between a laugh and a cry—and then I sits down and looks at my poor pale lass. There she lay with her great staring eyes, and the blue veins all showing through the skin, till I got to thinking of the bonny girl who used to walk with me o' summer eveuings, down the green lanes, talking about how we'd get on in the world; and then, one upon the other, comes the thoughts of all we'd had to go through since that time, in spite of my trying all my best, and fighting up hill and down dale with poverty. I knew it was my fault, for I'd been bit with the idea o' bettering myself, and left good wages to come up to London and get more—like that dog in the spelling-book. Yes, just like him; and I was getting the shadow now, and no mistake: there was plenty of shadow hanging over us both, but no substance.

I couldn't help it; I knew she did not like it; but I went out directly, and got took on at the great railway yard as sort of helper in the stables—being an engine fitter—and was set to work cleaning the great steam horses all amongst the oil, and grime, and smoke. But dirty work brings clean money; and before long I found as I'd been giving way to foolish thoughts, for my lass got better and more cheerful, and left off taking on about the baby, and keeping herself weak and poorly—leastwise, that is what the want o' money did—and soon I used to come home and find as she'd been blackleading and tidying up till the place shone again; while, as soon as she heard my step on the stairs—'taint a light one—she'd tickle the fire in the ribs till it laughed, and home looked quite first chop. Then, too, she began, as the spring time came to get a pot or two o' musk, and primroses, et cetrer, such as used to make us both sit and think of the country. And it's wonderful what there is in some o' them little flowers; why we've sat over one here in the midst of the soot, and chimney pots, and bricks and mortar, and been far away directly—hand in hand in the sunny lanes: up the banks; or in the shady woods; listening to the blackbird's sweet notes, and the twit tering and hum all around us; till, somehow or other, it all comes to this again, that you leave off thinking with a sigh, and feeling a bit dewy, while Nancy generally says—

"Ah' Harry: man made the big town, but God made the beautiful country!"

But I've no call to grumble, for I see plenty of the country now, if it is in a hurry, and mostly of a night. For from being a steady, blunderhead, straightforward sort o' chap, I got from cleaning to be took on to stoke a goods engine; and that frightened Nancy terribly, for he werry first week if I didn't smash my thumb, by catching it against the door as I was throwing in a great lump o' coal. That threw me back a bit; but I got all right again, and stoked that engine till a chance of a rise came, and I was changed to stoke a passenger engine, which is pleasanter; for goods traffic is so much of it in the night, and there you are shunting about sometimes for long enough in the middle of the cold dark hours, picking up empties, and leaving truck as are lull, till it gets werry tiring; then, too, sometimes you gets run off on a siding to let the passengers trains go by, for they has the run of the road.

Well, I was now a stoker on a passenger engine, and liked it better; but, before so very long, I gets put back to the goods, but this time as driver, and werry proud I felt when I got home and told the wife; but not half so proud as I did when, in course o' time, I got to be driver of a passenger engine—thought it was only a "parly." While now I'm bang up atop o' the tree, and drives the night express—though I do now reckon some day o' driving a special as has got some o' the Royalties in it; after which they may make me a d'rector or not, just as they likes, for I shall be satisfied anyhows.

"Well, but," I says, "some one must do it; and look, what a position we holds. Don't be uncomfortable, lass; it's my impression as I'm as safe dashing along full swing, as I am sitting here. 'Taint for us to be going through life afraid to put one foot afore the other, when we know as there's One as will clear the way for us." And I then looks round and sees our little place, how snug it was, and how we'd prospered; and then how neat and nice somebody else looked, though there was a streak or two of grey peeping out of her smooth shiny black hair—for Nancy never fell into the habit o' getting untidy as she grew older, while she never lets me see the wash-tub—and there: I'm at it again! I could go on all night about my wife; and suppose it's because I'm proud of her.

One night I walks down to the terminus, big as you please, for I was an old stager on the line even then. My stoker was in the shed with the engine—steam well up and all ready for a start; bright and clean as a new pin, and every joint and rod oiled and easy as I could see, as I cast my eyes round her—just like an old stage coachman before starting. There were the red lights on, and so I goes and times my watch, which wasn't two seconds wrong; jumps up, and we runs out of the shed on to the main line; and then, after a shout to the chap at the points, we runs back—easy—easier—easiest—and brings up against the train without hardly springing a buffer; porter couples us on, just as the first bell's going; and there we were all ready for a start.

"Jangle, jangle," goes the second bell; "bang, bang," the doors; "chirrup," the guard's whistle; and as the boy yelled out the evening papers, I touched the screamer, and then the starter, and—"puff, puff," goes the engine; and then—as if impatient to be off—"puff, puff, puff, puff," in rapid time, spinning the driving wheels round on the smooth metals before she had got fairly started. Then with a run, we slided out of the great glass terminus; went with a shriek into the tunnel, out again; past the sidings and empty trucks, and yard full of carriages under repair; rattling over the points and turntables; and then faster, and faster, and faster—off and away, so that the long stretched out rows of gas-lamps, right and left seemed to turn round, and round, as though there was a turntable under them; on past the first little station just as we was getting into full swing; and then the gas lamps all left behind, and we going full rush into what seemed like a black mountain right before us.

It aint everybody as has been on an engine at full speed, on a winter's night; when it's that dark you can a'most feel it. Perhaps you don't know as it goes along like jumpin at every stroke o' the piston-rod, just as if it was galloping—the coupling irons and buffers prevents your feeling that in the carriages—but first time of going on a fast engine would make you hold on pretty tightly. I like it, though; it warms one up in spirit, even if the wind's enough to freeze you, while the heat from the fire's ready to roast; and it does roast, sometimes, when we hold a bit of steak on a fork in it.

Away we go with the wind whistling by, till far on ahead there's a twinkling light or two; and then a bright green star, that we get nearer and nearer, till with a whistle and scream we fly thundering by another station—the lights seeming to run one into another as we dart past. Now, with the furnace door wide open, and the light streaming out on to the steam and smoke, we look like a comet rushing along, if it is only five-and-forty miles an hour; though those great speeds we read of quite put me out o' conceit. Think of the earth going round at the rate of a thousand miles an hour! I've been sixty, and that's quite fast enough for me.

But you people in the carriages don't know what it is dashing along through darkness, hail, rain, or snow; eyes right ahead, and fist on the handle; always on the look out for danger signals; and knowing what a little thing would send the whole train into one ruinous smash.

Yes; there's some confidence placed in us, as we stand there, fair weather or foul, watching ahead for danger, doing our best, and trusting in Providence for the rest, as on this first thirty miles run without stopping, away we go shrieking past station after station as though we meant to tear up the metals. Off and away through tunnel after tunnel—no blacker than the night outside; over viaduct, along steep embankments and down in deep cuttings; through the gloom of the night; seldom thinking of the danger; and always, as a man should in all things, watching ahead!

Away we went on the night I'm talking about, till the red lights peered out of the darkness, and our first thirty miles was done in not such a great deal more than half an hour; then, watering up off and away again, with the lights left behind, and we, tearing into the black night.

Tom Crawley was a good stoker, and the steam was well up; so that we were soon on full swing again, shrieking 'em up at the little stations, and then away again with a rush over the country. I was staring straight ahead, and had my hand on the whistle, for it was just time for us to pass a new station. Tom pushed past me and gave my round glass a rub, and then I could see the green light—faint, then bigger, and I gives a whistle: when, as I does it, I sees the lamp turned into a red one, and dashes the handle on one side to shut off the steam, same time letting the whistle shriek for the guards's break to be screwed down; but, bless you, it did not seem an instant, though I had time to think as it was here they shunted the goods train, when there was a sharp crash and something broke the round window of the screen; and then we were darting on faster than ever, for the shock had turned on the steam once more. I nods to Tom to grind down his break, as I tried to shut off again; but it was like pulling at a post, and though Tom came and helped, we could not move the handle, for a part of the valve was broke

I dashed open the furnace door, for I thought we was going werry free, and wondered why the guard hadn't clapped on his break; but, to my surprise, I finds as we were alone; that the couplings had broke with the shock of what we had run into, and there was Tom Crawley and me with the engine and tender, and full steam on, going quite sixty mile an hour.

I gives Tom the sign, and he stoops down, rattles out a rod or two, and down goes the fire bars on to the line in a moment, dropping out the whole of the fire, with the glowing coal and coke flying in great sparks behind us; but that had no effect, for on we tore, with the whistle shrieking and screaming, past two stations, while the next was to have been our halting-place.

Tom wanted to jump off, but I took hold of his arm and stopped him, though I couldn't help asking myself whether it wouldn't be the best thing to do; for, with the big junction station within a few miles, where we ought to pull up, who could say if the line was clear on the other side?

On we went, screaming along, at a fearful rate—some minutes before our time. There were the red lights and the lamps of the station, and I made another drag at the handle, but it was like tugging at a rock; and then there was a flash of light on each side, and we were through the station, and away again into the great black mountain always ahead.

"Now," thinks I; "they'll telegraph right on, from station to station, that there's a runaway engine, and she'll soon cool down now."

But she seemed as if she'd never cool down, but tore shrieking on past two more stations; and I began to wonder at last whether we ever should stop; and now for the first time, began to feel horribly frightened—for the excitement had kept the fear off before.

At each station, now, they showed the red lights, and we had just passed one signal—slackening pace a good deal—when from the sharp swerve I felt the engine give, I knew we had been turned on to a siding Just then as though with a flash, came over me the thoughts of the great danger I was in. You'd say; there was no time for thought; but there was and there, in the midst of that peril, I could see a little tiny fellow kneeling down before his mother, and saying after her some words as have never been forgotten, and I should say never can be. With those words gushing from my heart, and with a Great Name upon my lips, I gave one glance at my mate; and at the same moment Tom Crawley and I jumped off—right and left—when it seemed that I heard the noise of thunder and then went to sleep.

But I soon came to; only being a bit stunned; but Tom had a broken leg, and was badly scalded from the overturned engine, which the station people shunted off the main line, so that it ran smash on to the siding buffers, doing five hundred pound worth o' damage to itself in a moment.

There wasn't no lives lost, however, but it was a mercy as there wasn't, for we had run right into the tail of a goods train as was being shunted; and though the guard's van was shivered to atoms, my train was not much damaged, only a carriage or two sent off the line, and the people shook, while I've told you how we left it behind. Of course there was an investigation; but I went on with my dooty directly.

I said before that I wasn't much hurt, but I was a good bit shook, and so was some one at home: and she wanted me to give up for something else, but I looks round at the comforts we enjoys, and I says—"No, we must have engine-drivers. That's the only accident I've met with;" and I kep' on.

That's years ago now, and with the exception o' once cutting a poor cow all to pieces, I've had no more upsets: so I keeps driving the express, trusting in Providence; hoping for the best; and, fine weather or foul, well watching ahead.

THE EXPENSE OF WAR.—Twenty million thalers, part of the war expenses to be paid by Austria to Prussia, were despatched from Vienna to Berlin a few days ago, by a special goods train via Prague. The money is all in silver thalers, packed in casks, and in the counting of it twenty officials have been engaged for six days. The train had an escort o ten bank officials, twelve servants, and thirty soldiers.

AT THE LAST.

IS some one singing in the street?
Or am I dreaming? for I hear
A choir of voices wildly sweet
Float softly to my dying ear.

It sinks into the distance. Hark!
It rises; now it falls again:
So sweet and clear I scarcely mark
The pauses in the wondrous strain.

I do not wander, think not so;
The golden doors were left ajar,
And that wild music wandered through
The shining of the evening star.

You must not think of me as dead
Nor lost, but merely gone before,
Borne by the grace of him who bled
Before you to the voiceless shore.

For what is death when faith is strong?
Or what is night when morning break?
But rest to those who suffer long,
And light to those who gladly wake.

Now kiss me, sweet; Nay, closer come,
I feel my strength is ebbing fast,
And in my ears a distant hum
Of waves which murmur lapsing past.

They come! they come! more near, more near,
I hear the ripple weired and dread;
The shadow of a nameless fear
Is slowly darkening round my bed.

More light! more light! my eyes grow dim,
At threshold of the heavenly gate
I pause and vainly grope for him
Who seems to leave me desolate.

One moment only. Lo! I see
His hand rolls back these mists of fear;
They wait in lustrous white for me,
To waft me up the azure clear.

See! see! a myriad rays and lights
Are flashing up the mighty dome;
While angels from the starry hights
Stretch out their arms to bear me home.

There all the glory grandly meets,
In wide and glistening flakes it falls;
It flashes on the golden streets,
It gleams upon the jasper walls.

It flashes on a thousand gems,
A thousand facets' glistening sheen;
The river's glancing waves it stems
With shining tracts of red and green.

I see the broad light grow and grow
Far up the hight where angel throngs
In shining cohorts, row on row,
Sing to the Lamb their endless songs.

They beckon each with golden palm;
I seem to draw a purer breath;
I clasp the Everlasting arm
And wake. "Where is thy sting, O death?"

WASHINGTON, D. C. D. DE WARDENAU.

CHARLES LAMB.

A SMALL spare man, clothed in black, who went out every morning and returned every afternoon, as regularly as the hands of the clock moved towards certain hours. You could not mistake him. He was somewhat stiff in his manner, and almost clerical in dress; which indicated much wear. He had a long, melancholy face, with keen penetrating eyes; and he walked with a short, resolute step, City wards. He looked no one in the face for more than a moment, yet contrived to see everything as he went on. No one who ever studied the human features could pass him by without recollecting his countenance; it was full of sensibility, and it came upon you like a new thought, which you could not help dwelling upon afterwards; it gave rise to meditation and did you good. This small, half-clerical man, was—Charles Lamb.

No one has described Lamb's manner or merits so well as Hazlitt: "He always made the best pun and the best remark in the course of the evening. His serious conversation, like his serious writing, is his best. No one ever stammered out such fine piquant, deep, eloquent things, in half a dozen sentences, as he does. His jests scald like tears; and he probes a question with a play upon words. There was no fuss or can't about him. He has furnished many a text for Coleridge to preach upon."

Through Mr. Procter's eyes let us next see Charles Lamb in that one of his books which is the truest reflex of his life and character. Mr. Elia was a senior clerk in the India house, who was dead before the appearance of the Essays written in his name.

Of the Essays of "Elia," written originally for the London Magazine, I feel it difficult to speak. They are the best amongst the good: his best. I see that they are genial, delicate, terse, full of thought, and full of humor; that they are delightfully personal; and when he speaks of himself you cannot hear too much; that they are not imitations, but adoptions. We encounter his likings and fears, his fancies (his nature) in all. The words have an import never known before; the syllables have expanded their meaning, like opened flowers; the goodness of others is heightened by his own tenderness; and what is in nature hard and bad is qualified (qualified, not concealed) by the tender light of pity, which always intermingles with his own vision. Gravity and laughter, fact and fiction are heaped together, leavened in each case by charity and toleration; and all are marked by a wise humanity. Lamb's humor, I imagine, often reflected (sometimes, I hope, relieved) the load of pain that always weighed on his own heart.—Procter's Charles Lamb.

THE TIMES WE LIVE IN.

"HOW do you feel amidst all these events?" said a friend the other day. "I feel as if I were alive," was the reply, which we believe is a feeling just now very strong among all who take any interest, however slight, in the movement of the world. Englishmen feel something like men comfortably seated in a theatre in presence of a great play, inactive, full fed, almost too lazy to raise their opera glasses or sniff at the odor of gas which occasionally interrupts their comfort, but nevertheless keenly alive, conscious that every faculty of the brain is at its highest tension. For the play is for once a wonderful one. We are living, and begin to be conscious that we are living, in one of those seed-times of the world which, recur only after long cycles, when the ground, long ploughed and manured, is at last to be turned to use, a seed time of empires, and creeds, and discoveries, and systems of thought which as they germinate and flourish, will in their beauty or their ugliness make the Old World, which looked so bare, irrecognizable in its rich variety of crop, and color, and life. Nothing was till lately so common as to hear the cry, especially from the young, "Oh, that I had been born at another time, when life was simpler, and movement greater and mankind had ends!" Tennyson expressed the thought of a generation when he sang—

"What is that which I should turn to, lighting upon days like these?
Every door is barred with gold and opens but to golden keys,
Every gate is thronged with suitors, all the markets overflow?
I have but an angry face—what is that which I should do?
* * * * * * * * *
But the jingling of the guinea helps the hurt that Honor feels,
And the nations do but murmur, snarling at each other's heels."

The same cry is still heard, but it has ceased to be real. If the Englishman cannot act, he can at least observe, and feel that his intellect "lives," if he does not. If he is a politician, he is living in an age which, alike in the dramatic character of its events and the grandeur of some of its ideas, has scarcely a parallel in history.

Within five years we have witnessed the greatest, it may be the last struggle between the ideas of freedom and slavery, each held by millions conscious, however dimly, of their objects, and prepared to go on for their sake to the bitter end. The Old World and its aspirations gave place finally to the new and its hopes, when Lee surrendered his sword, and the defeat was as dramatic, as much of a sudden surprise, as near to a true battle of Armageddon, as any catastrophe in history has ever been. The principle of nationalities, first a dream, then a thought, then a hope, has risen almost within months into a power able to shake down States and remodel maps, has pulled an old nation as it were by the hair from under the sea into the air and light, is, as we write, driving the whole kingdoms together with a clash which reverberates through the world. Young men read of the rise of Holland to independence, and think that was a grand time; was it grander in all true elements of grandeur than this rise of Italy out from under the Austrian waves? The French Revolution was a great event, an event which to this hour seems to choke up the memories of the old, but save in misery how was it greater as an event than this Revolution in Germany? Crowns did not topple faster in 1790-98 than in 1867, Sadowa was at least as striking an event as Waterloo. The Seven Years' war was a "great episode in history;" we have lived through it all compressed into seven days.

The rise of France to dictatorship was not more marvellous, was not to the Continent more full of hope or menace than the rise of Prussia. Armies only defined by fractions of millions, armies such as marched when Rome and the barbarians came into their final collision, are moved as rapidly as they seem to be moved when we hear only of starting-point and destination, the slaughter is as that of the battles which are landmarks in history, the consequences such as those which students ponder through the succeeding centuries. The progress of the world was not more affected by the struggle between the Hohenstauffens and the Popes, the State and the Church, or between France and the Continent, democracy and feudalism, than by this struggle just ended between Prussia and Austria. We have men, too, among it all, big, visible figures. No age has ever perhaps been richer in prominent individual personages in whom the world could take a fierce interest than that which has produced Napoleon and Bismark, Lincoln and Gladstone, Von Moltke and Garibaldi.

Men are never tired of considering the Reformation, and the reaction which followed it; but was it a greater time, a time in which more ideas were born, or in which systems of thought struggled more visibly towards the light than this? Enlightenment and obscurantism are but Protestantism and Romanism, with their frontiers widened beyond the theological limit, doing battle for the liberation of man as well as of man's soul, of his intellect as well as of his conscience. The Papacy is in the throes as visibly now as it was when Leo X., died, may revive under our eyes as it revived under the eyes of those who defeated the Armada. And we shall see it and be conscious of it, as they scarcely did or were. Every blow struck on either side reverberates instantly through the world. We receive by telegraph the bull against civilization; read in a special correspondent's letter how Dollinger—Erasmus—proposes to reconcile Rome and science; can, if we will, hear the debate which terminates monarchism in Italy; see, almost while they are writing, the decrees which throughout Germany will end the right of the Papacy to stifle theological thought. Realism has revived among us, and is modifying every branch of progress, sweeping away remorselessly all the films which stood between thought and fact. Nothing is "sacred," in the old sense of sacredness, nothing tabooed, nothing admitted on account of the authority it can quote in its behalf. The human mind is breaking its bonds.

Nothing in our day, it is true, compares or can compare with the discovery of America, the greatest impulse from without ever received by human energy, a momentum as great as we should receive were a new planet suddenly to attach itself to the earth; but the scope for adventure, and travel, and even conquest is nearly as wide as ever, their results as dramatic. It is within seven years that we have seen Cochin China turned into a colony, and the "unknown capital," Pekin, entered by European troops, a new civilization revealed in Japan, the source of the Nile discovered, Australia crossed, the few closed places of earth thrown open to energy and enterprise. To those who wish to found kingdoms, or discover El Dorados, or civilize savage races there are as many fields as ever, and a new certainty that mankind will bear speedily of all they have done.

No mechanical invention corresponds or can quite correspond in value with the printing press, but we have but just solved the problem of instant communication throughout the planet, just drawn within speaking distance continents which three hundred years ago were still, as they were from the beginning of time, ignorant of each other's existence. The compass is of more use, but it scarcely strikes the imagination of science more than the discovery of the spectrum, and gunpowder did not revolutionize warfare more than the breech-loader may yet do. We talk much of the mighty emigration from Asia which buried the civilization of Rome—what is it when compared with the exodus to the West, going on every day before our eyes, this yearly march to America of any army greater than that which followed Alaric? The new life introduced by the barbarians was not more novel than the life which is growing up in the Far West, feudalism no more potent agency than the system of equality of condition.

Commerce, science, art are in a condition of almost morbid activity, and scarcely a newspaper appears without an announcement which in the good old times, when men had leisure to gossip and wits congregated in taverns, would have furnished matter for a week's reflection. Life is alive even here, with a change in prices as great as that which followed the discovery of America, a social change as wide as that which produced the Poor Law, and a political change as formidable as that of 1831, all going on together, and all going on amid the thunder of changes, each greater than they, reverberating from all sides of the world. There is no Charles V. to watch, but there is Frederick William; no Philip II., but Napoleon writes, like him, letters to Flanders, and Florence, and Vienna, which presage expeditions; there is now new America, but there is Asia unveiling herself; no printing-press to wonder at, but electricity is beginning to do its appointed work. The torpor of the body may be deep, but the mind is awake and the imagination running riot, and whether we are thinking or only dreaming, still this generation is alive—vividly alive!—London Spectator.

WINTER BONNETS.—The new winter bonnets, in Paris resemble miniature cabriolets, they have large crowns and long curtains, and are altogether ungraceful and ugly. If the form is accepted, the head will be completely buried, and truly it will be passing from one extreme to another. Excessively plain women will profit by this sudden change, but those who have the smallest pretensions to beauty will lose by it. But this novelty is only an attempt on the milliners' part to introduce something more elaborate and difficult to fabricate than the present simple head-dress.

A LONG, exceedingly fine chain is very fashionable, at the present moment in Paris. It appears like a string of small beads; but it is not so. The seeming beads are all metal, shaped to simulate beads, and linked one within the other. They are used as watch guards, are very inexpensive, and may be of gilt, silver or jet.

BLACK SHEEP.—A story by Edmund Yates, from Charles Dickens' Magazine, with summary of portions already published, is continued on the second page of to-day's CALIFORNIAN.

AN ENGLISH VIEW OF THE MEXICAN SITUATION.

IT seems but a short time since the leading English journals of Tory proclivities contemptuously scouted the notion that the French Emperor would abandon the Mexican project in deference to the wishes of the United States. The language employed in alluding to the subject was such as seemed to imply that any attempt on the part of our Government to interfere in the matter would be the height of temerity. Now, however, an entirely new view of "the situation" seems to have dawned upon the minds of our English friends. It is no longer "the Americans" who "cannot afford to quarrel with so powerful an enemy as France," but the reverse. "The Emperor of the French," says the London Saturday Review, "has wisely decided to abandon his great project, and to leave his bright vision unfulfilled. The United States pressed him hard, and he gave in * * * * his only aim recently has been to retire without absolute and public disgrace. * * * He will not do anything more for the Empire he set up, and he probably thinks that the sooner the whole business is abandoned the better."

The tone of these comments furnishes a marked contrast to that of the same journal only a few months since, when the protests and remonstrances of the press of the United States on the subject were only alluded to as examples of American braggadocio, and the Monroe Doctrine was never mentioned without a jest or a sneer. Now, we are told, "The Americans are very determined that the Mexican Empire shall end, and that the French shall withdraw at a very early date." Further more: "The terms in which the American President has proclaimed the nullity of the blockade of Matamoras are very insulting to France. The Emperor whom France has set up is spoken of in the most insulting terms as a mere intruder. The blockade which a French vessel is enforcing is considered to be altogether non-existent. But probably the Americans are perfectly aware that no offence will be taken at Paris. What is the Emperor Napoleon to do if he is not prepared to go to war with the United States? And he certainly is not prepared to go to war. He could not engage in a contest with the United States, and have any fair prospect of success, if a condition of success was that he should continue to hold Mexico."

That Maximilian's brief dream of Empire is over, and that the French must leave Mexico, are indeed things no longer doubtful. If the Emperor and his suite, together with his foreign troops and chief supporters can effect their escape in safety, it will be matter for rejoicing. Their enemies, however patriotic the spirit by which they have been animated during the struggle, are of a race not remarkable for power of self-restraint, or for moderation in the hour of triumph; and the fear lest a general massacre of Imperialists should be inaugurated, unless the withdrawal shall be very skilfully managed, does not seem to be altogether unreasonable.

In regard to what is to follow the withdrawal of the French troops, the Review is of the opinion that "under one pretext or another, and in the person of some President to be decided on, a Republican Government will be set up, virtually protected by the United States," which vaticination seems more likely to be fulfilled than that which immediately follows, introduced by a modest "perhaps," to the effect that the United States Government may choose to "soothe the feelings of the French by reimbursing them a fraction of their outlay."

There is something touching and almost pathetic in the resignation with which English toryism, only a few months since so incredulous as to the possibility of such an event as the French Emperor receding from his position, and so pleasantly derisive of American "braggadocio" in regard to the Monroe Doctrine, has at length come to contemplate what seems inevitable. Indeed so philosophic has toryism become, that it is in a vein of sadness rather than of indignation, that the Review declares the melancholy probability that "American adventurers will seize on all the most promising speculations that the country has to offer," will "gradually turn the wealth of the country to their advantage, and make the few industrial enterprises of Mexico their own."

ORGANIZATION OF SPIRITUALISTS.

From an "Address to the Spiritualists and all Liberal-minded Persons in the State of Illinois," recently issued by a committee appointed at a convention of Spiritualists held at Rockford, in that State, it appears that an extensive organization of all who accept the spiritualistic creed is about to be attempted. The committee, in their report, declare their conviction that there is a sufficient number of "liberal-minded persons" in the United States, who are "entirely free from all forms of church fellowship and sectarian bondage," to exert greater influence and effect more important objects than "any religious organization" in the country. The committee further profess to be satisfied, that "among these persons are more knowledge and more facts relating to the soul—to the spirit world—to death and the after life, and the relation of the spirit world to this, and its assumed correspondence with this sphere of being, than is possessed by any sect of Christians; and that these facts and this knowledge are mainly ignored by our sectarian churches, but are vitally important in our age of intellectual development for the further continuance of religious growth." Furthermore, the committee are of opinion that "the faith, hope, and belief of the Christians are not sufficient to satisfy or sustain the religious growth of these liberal-minded persons."

The practical portion of the report consists of a recommendation to organize in every State, what, for lack of a more distinctive term, we must characterize as "Spiritualistic Churches," which are to be without creeds, articles of belief or discipline, or any qualifications for membership beyond the mere wish of the individual to unite with them.

Possibly, Mr. Todd and Mrs. Ada Hoyt Foye are to be regarded as the evangilists of the new Spiritualistic Church in this State.

"MY FRIEND," a poem by Charles Warren Stoddard, originally written for THE CALIFORNIAN, and published in it several months since, appears in the number of the New York Weekly Review of September 15th, as a contribution for that paper. This is not the first instance in which poems of Mr. Stoddard, which first appeared in THE CALIFORNIAN, have been republished as "original" in the Review. We are quite at a loss as to the explanation of so singular a proceeding.

PIONEERS' ADDRESS.—We have received a copy of the oration of the Hon. J. W. Dwinelle, delivered before the Society of California Pioneers, on the occasion of their recent anniversary. It is a masterly production, evincing much original research and curious scholarship, and we hope to be able to make more extended reference to it at some future time.

THE GALAXY.—We have received from W. E. Loomis, corner of Washington and Sansome streets, the October number of this illustrated magazine, for which he is the California agent. Though not a year in existence, The Galaxy has already won an enviable name for literary ability; and the October number is full of readable articles.

We have received from the Book House of A. Roman & Co., the following new publications:

Epidemic Cholera; Its Phenomena, Causes, and Mode of Communication; Together with its Prevention and Proper Treatment, being the Substance of two Popular Lectures, Delivered in the University of New York—By J. G. Webster, M. D.

Dr. Webster illustrates his confidence in the soundness of his theory, in regard to the cholera, by declaring, "If people would everywhere carry out, in practice, the principles here laid down, cholera would be banished from the earth."

The Lady's and Gentleman's Science of Etiquette, and Guide to Perfect Manners in Society—By Count D'Orsey and Countess De Calatrella.

In addition to disquisitions upon etiquette, manners, dress, social usages, etc., this volume contains numerous observations on dress, and receipts for the preparation of various important articles for the toilette.

The Atlantic Monthly will begin the next year with the first chapters of a novel by the author of "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table."

DECREES.

I SIT in sorrow by the watery gates,
A questioning the Fates.
I ask, fair Fates, what manner of ships are these Slipping adown the seas?
Slipping adown the slanting seas—what sail
Is yonder, calm and pale?
Then the Fates answer me: "That goodly bark
Braving the waters dark
"So fearlessly, the cross upon her mast,
Is Trust, come home at last.
"Yon quivering craft that veers and puts about,
Is the long-cruising Doubt.
"This dancing galley that the waters mock,
Shall strike upon the rock.
"'Tis Chance, a pleasure yacht; her ribs shall bleech
Upon the blistering beech."
Yet still I see a flamelike, shining cloud,
And eagerly cry aloud,
That other sail that wails upon the wind—
What is her name and kind?
To me the Fates, "Though lying still and wan,
She shall approach anon.
"So nobly manned—with any gale to cope—
Behold the trusty Hope."
Quicken the winds I pray you worthy Fates,
In her are stored my freights!
Nor am I fit for life of any sort,
Till she shall reach the port.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct., 1866. CHARLES WARREN STODDARD.

LOCAL ART ITEMS.

LOVERS of art have been more than usually favored during the past week by the exhibition at Messrs. Jones & Wooll's gallery of quite a large collection of paintings.

Among the number we noticed from the easel of Denny, views of Trinidad Bay, the Farallones, San Pablo Bay, the Golden Gate, and a tropical sunset scene very wild and exaggerated in color. They are not without considerable merit, but they appear to have been hastily and carelessly executed, and leave an impression upon the mind of the observer that the artist has been untrue to himself and unjust to the public in not doing his best. We certainly think that our artists are themselve, to a great degree, responsible for the complaints of poor remuneration, and we believe that more zeal and painstaking on their part, with much less indifference to criticism, would greatly enhance prices and increase orders.

The views of "Cathedral Rock," and "Half Dome," by Bush, are, in many respects, superior to his previously exhibited works, though faulty in coloring; but these also show haste and want of care—faults which no young artist can afford to be guilty of. It is but fair to say that these pictures are placed in a position that defies critical examination. To look at anything in this gallery is about as tantalizing as "endeavoring to eat soup with a string out of a junk bottle."

We think our artists should be content with canvas of more moderate size. Big pictures, unless by great artists, are generally big failures; besides, at the rate our people pay for works of art—judging from the remarks of a correspondent in last week's CALIFORNIAN—the frame costs more than the picture, and when the mechanic receives more than the artist it cannot be otherwise than discouraging to the latter.

The view in Yo-Semite Valley, by Hill, is very much the same as everything else he has painted on that subject—better, however, because it is smaller—but it is very cold and gloomy. Hill has two other small pictures that do him little credit in design or execution.

Some shortsighted speculator in art has imported three enormous paintings from Europe in the hope of selling them in this appreciative region. We were unable to learn the names of the artists. The pictures respectively represent "Daniel in the Lions' Den," "Joseph in Prison," and a "Market Scene." The last is by far the best and contains some very effective figures. If they can be called great, otherwise than in size, we confess to an inability to fully appreciate them. Our thought on looking at them was of the immense good it would do to distribute the price asked for them amongst several of our struggling and deserving artists; and how much more it would tend to the encouragement of genius, the advancement of art and the satisfaction of the buyer to turn the money into such a fruitful chance.

In Roos' window may be seen at last the truly excellent water colors by Keith, heretofore mentioned by us. They have attracted considerable attention, and we hope to see them followed by other and still superior efforts.

At this place are two oil paintings by Wandesforde, hithert unnoticed. One is a very calm and pleasing moonlight scene, needing a much better light than it has, and the other is a view of Mount Hood, somewhat inferior in point of coloring, but well and carefully executed, as all works of this artist are.

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"The gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I will roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I will aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

The Teetotal Temperance Convention.

To the Editor of the Californian:

SIR:—Your "Lion's Mouth" has uttered many sensible roars against humbug of all kinds, therefore I am encouraged to hope that it will roar against an absurd statement made by a Dr. Gibbons at the State Temperance Convention on Wednesday last. In the report published in the Bulletin I find the following:

"Dr. Gibbons said that it was a well-known fact that alcohol taken into the stomach in wine was much more injurious than in distilled spirits. Wine contained, besides brandy, large quantities of cream of tartar, which, as an article of commerce, was produced from the deposits of wine casks. There was no drunkenness which irritated the stomach like the drunkenness of wine. Intoxication from wine could easily be distinguished from all others. He had in mind a man who sometimes drank to excess. When he drank distilled spirits he was pleasant, though foolish; but when he drank wine to excess his conduct was brutal. Beer made a man stupid, and tended to make hogs of men. Cider was even worse. He related an instance where some one in early times joined an old-fashioned temperance society in which wine, beer and cider were permitted, and he became a more brutal man from cider drinking than from the use of distilled spirits."

Is this Dr. Gibbons an expert that his testimony on the subject of drunks is to be received? I don't believe his drunks have been as numerous or as varied as mine. I don't say he never was drunk—in fact I believe he was just a little tight when he said that wine casks were in the habit of producing cream of tartar as an article of commerce, but that doesn't signify; he's all wrong. He said "It was a well known fact that alcohol taken into the stomach in wine was much more injurious than in distilled spirits." Bosh! Alcohol is alcohol, and there is less alcohol in wine than there is in distilled spirits. Then he said: "There was no drunkenness which irritated the stomach like the drunkenness of wine" Pshaw! Let this Dr. Gibbons speak of his own stomach and not talk about other peoples' stomachs. Perhaps his stomach is naturally irritable. Bad wine of course irritates a gentlemanly stomach, but good wine, when introduced, associates itself in an intimate manner with the fish, quails, chickens and other creature comforts which it finds there. Then this Dr. Gibbons declared that he knew a man who "was pleasant, though foolish," when he drank distilled spirits, but was "brutal" when he drank wine. His charge against beer, is that it tends to "make hogs of men." I have done with Dr. Gibbons, he may have drunk beer to excess at some period of his existence and not yet have fully recovered from its effects. I wish to give my testimony as a man acquainted with drunks. Spirits of all kinds are more or less hurtful, according to the quantity drunk. Rum is a good liquor, but if stuck to for any great length of time, is apt to make you bilious; if you get drunk on it you have a terrible headache in the morning; brandy utterly destroys the digestion if taken, even in small doses, continuously; whisky is a good spirit, but will, after a man has got drunk on it two or three hundred times, affect his brain terribly; gin will thin a man down and do him but little good. Beer, as Dr. Gibbons observes, makes a man fat and stupid, but beyond this, does him but little harm. We do not believe that Dr. Gibbons can attribute his condition, in every respect, to beer. Wine was meant, as the Bible tells us, "to make merry the heart of man." Wine is the juice of the grape fermented. That which is often sold under the name of "wine" in San Francisco, is of course very often a mixture of water, alcohol, sugar, coloring matter and other materials. When a man gets "elevated" on fine old wine he feels good natured and, as the Bible expresses it, "merry." If he allows evil spirits to enter into him in the shape of villainous brandy, new rum, or vile whisky, he will probably be tempted to murder or steal. You will understand me I know. I am sorry to see the "Temperance men" making fools of themselves—as they always have in every country under the sun—by abusing the most harmless of all intoxicating fluids, and in the case of Dr. Gibbons, praising dram drinking as compared with "a glass of wine after dinner." Under these circumstances the Bulletin is wasting space which might be used more profitably when it chronicles the vaporings of Temperance maniacs. If you think it would be of service to the rising generation, I am willing to give an account of a few of my drunks to prove that a wine drunk is infinitely less immoral in its consequences than one of Dr. Gibbons' brandy drunks. I am yours temperately (but not teetotally temperately), BENJAMIN BIBULOUS.

A Homily for the "Times."

Being blessed with the agreeable consciousness of possessing a larger endowment of wisdom than we can conveniently use to advantage for our own behoof, we feel impelled to give our less fortunate fellow creatures the benefit of a portion of the surplus. Now we suspect, from general appearances, that the Times, which is to launch its bark upon the squally ocean of journalism on the fifth proximo, needs a little good advice. Most of its editors are provincials who are not thoroughly "up" in Metropolitan matters—very smart men undoubtedly, but not incapable perhaps, of learning a wrinkle or two from us that may be useful. Accordingly we shall proceed in a Christian and philanthropic spirit, to give them a few useful hints derived from a long experience, in the course of which we have finished off more papers with which we have first or last been connected, than any man in California—always excepting our distinguished friend the Tripple Thunderer of the Flag, whose "slain" outnumber ours even as David's did those of Saul

In the first place then, we exhort our brethren of the Times to bear it ever in mind that "dignity" is a great thing. If you're going to be a "solid" leading journal, you must above all things be dignified. Don't forget that, Mac. But then you mustn't run the thing into the ground you know. There is a little embarrassment about this, it must be confessed, for if you're lively, fresh, spirited, and wide awake, all the asses (always in the majority,) will bawl out "undignified!" But then if you go in strong for "dignity," the chances are that the same assinine majority, together with a strong minority not assinine, will call you "tame," "dull," "heavy," etc. So you see it's Scylla and Charybdis, Mac.—a decidedly ticklish situation. As to "leaders" you mustn't make 'em too straightforward and flat-footed—for that would be course and vulgar you know; and yet you must not go too much the other way—for that would look like whiffling. We admit it isn't easy to hit the precise key, but it can be done, and is no harder than walking on a tight-rope, or shooting a rapid in an Indian canoe. Now a word about the News Department. We advise Billy Bausman (who is to do the scissoring) not to clip too freely from the "upland papers." No one in San Francisco cares much what the Campton Clarion or the Rattlesnake Canon Blunderbuss are perorating about. But then it must be admitted a great many favorable "notices" from these interior organs can be obtained by occasionally quoting them. Give us plenty of Eastern news in detail, Billy, likewise foreign news—by so doing you will suit some people, and cause a good many others to swear that the paper is filled up with stuff that no one wants to read. Between these two classes it's a pretty even thing—after all one must use judgment. If you give a screed of poetry every day, and a nice little story once a week or so, it will please the ladies—though it may also produce the effect of disgusting your more practical-minded business friends. Finally, we would especially impress it upon the minds of the managing powers, that they take especial care to publish nothing that can offend any one. All extreme opinions are to be avoided. Don't say anything you may have to take back, or take sides on any question respecting which people differ. Be careful about praising any one—for that will offend his enemies; also about censuring anyone—for that will exasperate his friends. By carefully observing these rules (and you see how simple they are) you can perhaps (with good luck) manage to keep a going a year or so, (if the cash holds out) and build up as powerful and influential a journal as the Alta itself.

Dry Sermons.

THE Germans, though they have no objection to amusing themselves with music, dancing and much lager bier drinking after church time are, as a rule, in favor of devoting Sunday morning to religious observances solely. There exists in some parts of Germany, a law to prevent drinking during Divine service. It runs thus:—"Any person drinking in an ale house during Divine service on Sunday, or other holiday, may legally depart without paying."

This is as it should be. In San Francisco not very long ago "drinking during Divine service" was carried to an extent which was enough to horrify any Christian. This drinking during Divine service took place, not in an ale house, but in a certain church in this city. The members of the choir who were securely guarded from the observation of the congregation by curtains, were in the habit of consuming sundry and divers drinks during the service, and indulging in a cold collation accompanied with lager during sermon time. This state of things went on for some time without the unrighteous conduct of those irreverent hymn-singers being discovered by the church authorities; but, unfortunately for them, one Sunday one of their members who had made a little more money than he was usually in the habit of receiving, brought two or three bottles of champagne to church for the purpose of celebrating the event with his brother professionals, and enabling them to sit through a rather dry sermon comfortably. The popping of the champagne corks exposed them—an investigation was made, and from that day to this there has been no drinking in church during Divine service.

A Lazy Editor.

Some editors of newspapers are very lazy. The editor of the New York Despatch is one of these. In a recent number of the Despatch we find under the head of "A. J. on the Divinity of Tailoring," the following:

"There is one bit of Johnsonian facetiæ that is too much for us. We confess to know very little about the tailoring business, though we once read Sartor Resartus. We have heard of tailors' measures, (which we take to have something to do with 'bushelling,') likewise of nine tailors making a man, and of three famous tailors of 'Tooley street;' but our acquaintance with the shears has been of another description usually, and we cannot follow Mr. Johnson, professionally so far as might be 'fashionable.' For example, we are quite at a loss to know where the beloved A. J. discovered the fact, which he asserts to be 'historical,' that God was of the same trade as himself. 'In connection with your profession (proclaims this dignified and pious President of ours,) allow me to say that our great Father, the Head and Lord of all the world, was a TAILOR, and when you refer to the historic account of these things, you will find that my remarks are materially true.'

Passing over the incident flippancy of this speech, repeated twice on his journey already, we should like to have our learned Chief Magistrate give his 'historical' authority for the above morceau of gratuitous blasphemy."

It is quite evident that the editor of the Despatch is not well acquainted with the Bible, and is too lazy to search the Scriptures. "Indecent flippancy" and "gratuitous blasphemy" are not things to be passed over, but the "historical authority" which the Despatch so pertly demands is very easily given. Mr. Johnson referred to the 21st verse of the third chapter of Genesis. "Unto Adam also and to his wife did the LORD God make coats of skins, and clothed them."

A Farewell Sketch.

Our San Francisco caricaturist, Jump, after "taking off" our notable citizens for many years, and residing in this State for sixteen years, is about to take himself off Within a week or two he intends to start for New York. Before leaving he will publish, by subscription, a farewell sketch of some of the people whom he has known. If every one who has laughed at Jump's pictures subscribes for one copy of this farewell sketch, Jump will land in New York with his pockets well lined with twenties. "Jump's last" has often been noticed by the press. We are very, very sorry to say that the forthcoming picture will indeed be Jump's last. When he reaches New York, and we read of his triumphs in that city, we shall sigh to think that San Francisco could not afford him a good income, and thus retain him.

An Eastern Reputation.

We notice that the New York Home Journal, Leader, and other literary papers copy many articles from the San Francisco Dramatic Chronicle, giving due credit, and endorsing the sentiments expressed therein. The Chronicle, like other first rate California productions, is made much of abroad, and is, we are glad to observe, thoroughly appreciated in San Francisco by the public—though not very much by the press, newspaper proprietors not liking to see a good paper given away for nothing.

An Opposition to Jim Greeley.

The New York Home Journal says:

"A Bohemian and his wife, dwarfs of a considerable amount of ugliness, have brought a troupe of a dozen toads to a high state of artistic perfection, and intend to exhibit their artists shortly in Paris. The toads understand their respective names in Bohemian.

"'Mark Twain's' Jumping Frog of Calaveras County" will be eclipsed by these Bohemian toads. We have not the slightest doubt but that these dwarfs stole the idea from "Mark's" story, and, finding that frogs were scarce in Bohemia, determined to educate toads instead. Jim Greeley ought to have patented that frog.

A Frozen Fact.

Of course the Virginia City Union will declare that the following story which it published this week is "a frozen fact," but the statement is just a little too cool for us to swallow:

"A few nights since, when Wells, Fargo & Co's fast freight stage arrived at Crystal Lake, a man who had been riding on the back part of the stage got off and walked into the house, and as he approached the fire he fell on the floor and expired. A doctor who examined the body said that the deceased had "frozen to death." No one knew who the man was, or where he got on the stage; he had no baggage, and was only protected from the cold by a linen coat"

This won't do. We know something of the manners and customs of the Washoeites. Men don't travel on stage-coaches with nothing on but linen coats. No respectable driver would allow a man thus attired to ride on his stage. We are also expected to believe that a man walked up to a fire, fell on the floor and expired, and was pronounced by a doctor "frozen to death!" If there were any truth in this story the doctor would of course have said that he 'thawed to death" when he approached the fire. However, as "Mark Twain" has by this time arrived in Virginia City, we hope that the Union will have the modesty to refrain from attempting to perpetrate sells like the above.

The Progress of Rationalism.

Everyone has, of course, read Lecky's History of the Progress of Rationalism in Europe. The following paragraph, which we find in an Eastern exchange, proves that Her Majesty Queen Victoria has become a Rationalist in one particular: "A commodious and luxurious smoking-room, for the use of those members of the royal family who indulge in the weed, has just been finished at Balmoral Castle."

A very few years ago Her Majesty issued counter-blasts against tobacco almost as severe as the famous one which King James devoted the powers of his intellect to producing. We hope before long that there will be a smoking-room in Buckingham Palace. Up to the present time smoking has been considered a crime scarcely less heinous than high treason, by Queen Victoria; it was her only weakness, and we are glad to find that she has conquered it.

The Surest Mark of an Ass.

It takes a tolerably acute person, at times, to distinguish between a wise man and an ass. Such was the opinion of Cicero, who said: Sapientis est sapientem cognoscere. Perhaps the best test consists in the ability of the individual to "take a joke." The man who can't stand good-natured ridicule, who is continually getting his back up, and taking offence where none is intended, and can't enjoy a good thing at his own expense, is pretty sure to be an unmitigated ass. Just as a poodle is more irascible and quarelsome than a mastiff, we find that big men generally take a joke more kindly than little men, strong men than feeble men, healthy men than sick men, and wise men than fools.

[For the Californian.]

TO ——.

I SEEK the sands where the ocean's swell
Upheaves with the throe of its mighty life;
And I mark the play of its passion strong,
Till my own thoughts surge with a wilder strife.

For down on those glittering sands we went,
Long years ago in the month of May;
And your words were low as the moonbeams spent
Their mystic charm on our silent way.

And naught was heard save the sea's low plash
As it wept its woe in the sea beach lone;
And your murmured words, though the thought was rash,
Were sweeter far than the novelet's tone

Aye! softlier sweet; and their breath awoke
A thought that haunts me for evermore;
And to-night I murmur the words you spoke,
As I wander alone on the moonlit shore.

NEW YORK, Sept. 2d, 1866. L. S. D. L.

A FEW WORDS OF TRUTH.

To the Editor of the Californian:

It is a matter of astonishment to me that among all the writers, and I might add sufferers, for the press in California, there has not been one found with sufficient humanity or philanthropy to give our Eastern friends a clear idea of the class of emigration that is required on this coast. Is it that they are all too much absorbed in their individual troubles to care whether more are added to the thousands who are now suffering in this country from an inability to secure a living by such means as their education has fitted them for, or is it that they are too much wanting in moral courage to admit that their visions of fame and wealth have not been realized?

The truth is, there are only two classes of persons who may safely immigrate to California or Nevada—the capitalist, with means to develop the natural resources of the country, or to establish manufactories, and the laboring men and women. It is natural for young men, sent out into the world with only an education and their talents to rely upon, if they have energy, to turn their attention to a new country, particularly one of whose natural resources so much is being said. It is not strange, either, that, with all the outcry there has been about the need of female immigration, ladies should come here hoping to find employment as teachers, or in some way in which their talents and accomplishments would be recognized. The suffering among this class of people is, I suppose, greater than was ever known in any country on the face of the earth. Americans have been accustomed to weep over the graphic pictures given by Dickens and others of the lives of unfortunates of this description in England, but there are real cases that may be daily witnessed in this city that are quite as pitiable as any invented by the novelist. And the plain truth in regard to this condition of things ought to be distinctly proclaimed by the California press, and the correspondents of Eastern journals, by which means much disappointment and misery would be prevented. THE BRIDE.

HER finger was so small, the ring
Would not stay on, which they did bring:
It was too wide, a peck;
And to say truth (for it must out),
It looked like the great collar (just)
About our young colt's neck.

Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice, stole in and out,
As if they feared the light,
But oh! she dances such a way!
No sun upon an Easter day
Is half so fine a sight.

Her cheeks so rare a white was on,
No daisy bears comparison
(Who sees them is undone),
For streaks of red were mingled there,
Such as are on a Katherine pear,
The side that's next the sun.

Her lips were red, and one was thin!
Compared to that was next her chin,
Some bee had stung it newly;
But (Dick) her eyes so guard her face,
I durst no more upon them gaze,
Than upon the sun in July.

SIR JOHN SUCKLING.

CANTANKEROUS FOOLS.

THE ADVANTAGES OF BEING ONE.

LET me, not unkindly, set forth the praises of Cantankerous and Pig-headed Folly; and show certain reasons why it is profitable to a human being that he be a Cantankerous Fool.

There are cantankerous fools whom you can keep at arm's length; cantankerous fools with whom you need have nothing to do, cantankerous fools whom, having seen once, you need never see again. But human beings are linked by many social ties. And very often you find that you cannot escape from many relations with a cantankerous fool, and that you must just make the best of that offensive being. Now, how carefully you consider the tempers, the crotchets, the idiotic notions and prejudices, of the cantankerous fool from whom you cannot escape! As for a human being of good sense and good temper, nobody, in the common transactions of life, minds him. Nobody smooths him down, pets him, considers him, tries to keep him right. You take for granted he will do right and act sensibly, without any management

If you are driving a docile and well-tempered horse, who is safe to go straight, you give the animal little thought or attention. But if you have to drive a refractory pig, how much more care and thought you put into that act of driving! Your wits must be alive. You humor the abominable brute; you try to keep it in a good temper; and when you would fain let fly at its head, or apply to it abusive epithets, you suppress the injurious phrase, and you hold back the ready hand. So with many a human being, whom you are trying to get to act rationally, who hangs back on all kinds of idiotic pretexts, and starts all conceivable preposterous objections to the course which common sense dictates, frequently changing his ground, and defying you to pin him to any reason he states, as is the way with such creatures. When your tongue is ready to exclaim "O you disgusted and wrong-headed fool will you not try to behave rationally?" you withhold the ready and appropriate words, you know that would blow the whole thing up, and you probably say, in friendly tones, "My good fellow, there is a great deal in your objections; and we have all the greatest desire to do what you may wish; but then there is A, and B, difficult men to deal with; and in this little matter, you must just let us do what has been arranged. Pray do this, and we shall all be greatly obliged to you." Perhaps you even degrade yourself by suggesting to the cantankerous fool reasons which you know to be of no weight, but which your knowledge of the fool makes you think may have weight with his idiotic mind. By little bits of deference and attention, rendered with a smooth brow, beneath which lurks the burning desire to take him by the neck and shake him, you seek to keep straight by the inevitable cantankerous fool.

Yes, my reader, if you want to be deferred to, humored, made much of, if you want to have everybody about you trying to persuade you to act as a sensible man would act without any persuasion; and everybody quite pleased and happy if you have been got, after much difficulty, into the right track; see that you set yourself before that portion of mankind that cannot get rid of you, in the important and influential character of an ill-tempered and wrong-headed fool. The jibbing horse in the team, the loose screw in the machine, the weak link of the chain, they are the important things. People think of them, watch them, stand a good deal to keep them right. As Brutus shammed himself a fool for protection, so might a wise man in these days sham himself a fool for consideration. Don't be sensible and good-natured: nobody will be afraid of your taking the pet and getting into the sulks, then. People may indeed confound you behind your back; but before your face they will be civil to a degree they never would be with an amiable and judicious man.

PRIVILEGED PERSONS ARE CANTANKEROUS FOOLS.

The human being who is called a Privileged Person is generally a cantankerous fool. Sometimes, indeed, the privileged person is so privileged because of the possession of invaluable qualities which make you bear with anything he says and does. But the cantankerous fool from whom there is no escaping is the most privileged of all privileged people. No matter how ill-bred and provoking he is, you must just suffer it. No matter how far in the wrong he is, you must just try to smooth him down and make things straight. If you get into any altercation or difference with the fool, you are at a great disadvantage. He has no character to lose; but you probably have a reputation for good sense and good humor which any conspicuous disturbance would damage. Then, restrictions of decency in language and conduct fetter you, which are to the fool what the green rushes were to Samson. You could not for your life get up and roar, as you have seen the fool get up and roar.

If you know a man will bellow like a bull if you differ from him in opinion, you just listen to his opinion and hold your tongue. If a ditch be very pestiferous when stirred up, you don't stir it up. The great principle on which the privileges of cantankerous folly and ill-nature is found is this: that as we go on through life we grow somewhat cowardly; and if a thing be disagreeable, we just keep out of its way: sometimes by rather shabby expedients.

Well, after all, the deference paid to the cantankerous fool is not a desirable deference. True it is, that if you have to get twelve men to concur with you in a plan for bringing water into the town of which you are chief magistrate, or painting the church of which you are incumbent, or making some improvement in the management of the college of which you are principal, you bestow more pains and thought on the one impracticable, stupid, wrong headed, and cantankerously foolish person of the twelve, than upon all the other eleven. But this is just because you treat that impracticable and cantankerous person as you would treat a baby, or an idiot, or a bull dog, or a jackass. The apparent deference you pay the cantankerous man is simply an inferior degree of the same thing that makes you confess yourself a teapot if a raving madman has you at an open window, and says that he will throw you over unless you forthwith confess yourself a teapot. Pig-headed folly is so disagreeable a thing, that you would do a good deal to keep it from intruding itself upon your reluctant gaze; and the cantankerous fool, petted, smoothed down, complimented, deferred to, is truly in the most degraded position a rational being can easily reach. "O let us humor him: he is only Snooks the cantankerous fool;" "Give in to him a little: he will make no end of a row if you don't;" such are the reflections of the people who yield to him. If he had any measure of sense, he would see how degraded is his position; what a humiliating thing it is to be deferred to on the terms on which he is deferred to. But the notion of the presence of sense is excluded by the very terms of his definition. For how can there be sense in a cantankerous fool?

HOW WE TREAT FOOLS IN POWER.

All this, the thoughtful reader sees, leads us up to the wide and important subject of the Treatment of Incapacity. That varies, in the most striking way, as the position of an incapable person varies.

If a servant, lately come home, proves quite unfit for his work, you first scold him; and if that avail nothing, then you send him away. If the grocer who supplies you with tea and sugar, persists in supplying you with execrably bad tea and sugar, you resign your position as his customer: you enter his shop no more. But if the incapable person is in a sufficiently important place; and cannot be turned out of it; the treatment is entirely different. You stand up for the man. You puff him. You deny that he is incapable. You say he is "a very good appointment," however abominably bad you know him to be. The useless judge you declare to be a sound lawyer, whose modesty hinders the general recognition of his merits. The clergyman who neglects his duty shamefully, and whose sermons no man can listen to, you declare to be a good, sensible preacher, with no clap-trap about him: none of your new brooms that sweep far too clean. The hardly conceivable monarch, such as Georgius IV., of Brentford, who never did a brave or good deed in all his life, he takes his rank as the first gentleman in Europe. Yes; the peculiar treatment of the wrong man in the wrong place (by cautious and safe people,) is loudly to declare that he is the right man in the right place. The higher the place he disgraces, the louder and firmer the asseveration.

These cases will help the ingenuous reader to the great principle which decides the treatment of incapacity. It is this. An Evil you can remove, you look in the face. You see how bad it is. You even exaggerate its badness. But an Evil you cannot get rid of, you will try not to see. You seek to discover redeeming points about it. If you have a crooked stick to walk with, and cannot get another, you make the best of the crooked stick: you persuade yourself it is nearly straight. But if a handsome stick is offered you in its place, you pitch the wretched old thing away. Your eyes are open to a full sense of its crookedness In brief, the great rule is, that you make the best of a bad bargain.

Many married people have to do so. They are well aware that in marrying, they made an unhappy mistake. But they just try to struggle on; though the bitter blunder is felt every day. One great evil of the increased facility of divorce in these latter days is, that it tends to make men and women hastily conclude that a state of things is intolerable, which while deemed inevitable was borne with decent resignation. You try to put a good face on the trouble which cannot be redressed. You "make believe very much;" as all human beings have at some period of life in regard to their worldly position; the situation of their home; the state of their teeth; the incursions of age on their personal beauty. You were resolved to believe your dwelling a handsome and pleasant one; and your place in life not such a dead failure as in your desponding hours you plainly saw it to be. And who but a malignant fool would try to dispel the kindly delusion which keeps a man from quite breaking down? If your friend Smith was in his own eyes what he is in yours, he would lie down and die; overcome by the sense of being such a wretched little jackass. My friend Jones told me that once upon a time, attending a political meeting in America, he heard a man make a speech, every sentence of which cried aloud that the speaker was an inexpressible fool. At first, Jones was indignant at the speaker's manifest self satisfaction. But gradually Jones became reconciled to the state of facts as this consideration presented itself to his reflective understanding: That if the unhappy actor had thought of himself and his appearance as Jones thought of both, he would have fled to the remote wilderness and never been seen more!

HUMOR THE CANTANKEROUS FOOLS.

How are you to manage a cantankerous fool? If possible, you will of course avoid such. But how are you to deal with those whom you cannot avoid? Well, I know it does not sound magnanimous: but I fear you can govern the cantankerous fool only by careful consideration of his nature; and adaptation of your means to that. I mean, you will not suggest to him reasons of conduct which would have weight only with men of sense. If you want to melt a piece of wax, you bring it in contact with fire. But if you do the like with a piece of clay, the clay is hardened, not softened. In like manner, there are arguments and considerations which would make a man of good sense and temper to go to the right, which would make the cantankerous fool go to the left. What profit, then, in suggesting to the fool motives which his nature incapacitates him for understanding? You must deal with the animal as you find him: move him by the things that will make him move. The whipcord, which makes the donkey go, has no effect when applied to the locomotive engine; yet the whipcord serves its end when it makes the donkey go. And the reason which, being suggested to the sensible man, would make him ask you if you thought him a fool, will often avail to move the fool in the direction in which you would have him proceed.

I can see plainly that, in thus managing the cantankerous fool, you run the risk of falling to the use of means savoring of the base. But no rule can be laid down which may not be carried to an extreme. And we can but say, never say or do that which is sneaking or dishonest: even though by so doing you could get the fool to behave like a man of sense at the most critical juncture. I do not believe that honesty is the best policy. I have seen many cases in which it was plainly the worst. Yet honesty is unquestionably the thing for an honest man. And let the advice to govern the fool by regarding his nature, be understood as counselling you to do so, as far as an honest man may.

"KEEPING PEOPLE SWEET."

There is a process, singularly offensive to the writer, of which one sometimes hears mention. It is that of KEEPING PEOPLE SWEET; such is idiomatic phrase. It is a process not needful in the case of sensible people, who have no tendency to turn sour,—it is a mode of operation especially applicable in the case of the cantankerous fool. It consists in paying special defereuce to the person to be kept sweet,—in going frequently and asking his advice on matters as to which you have already made up your mind, and as to which you know well his opinion is of no possible value; in trying to smooth him down when he takes the pet, as he often does; in making many calls upon him; in conveying by many tacit signs that you esteem him as very wise, very handsome, very influential. I have used the masculine gender through the last sentence, though the peculiar usage described is much employed in the case of old women of pecuniary means. Sometimes, indeed, old women of no wealth nor influence wish people to take pains to keep them sweet; but in these instances the old women are generally permitted just to remain in a condition of unalleviated acidity.

O judicious reader, wise and amiable, and not uninfluential, receive it as a high testimony to your sense and temper, if no human being tries to keep you sweet! For, in all ordinary cases, the fact that you try to keep any mortal sweet, testifies to your firm conviction that the mortal in question is a silly, if not a cantankerous fool!—Fraser's Magazine.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisca News.

ESTATES UPON WHICH LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION HAVE BEEN ISSUED, BUT NO PROPERTY RECEIVED.

Letters of Administration have been issued on the following Estates, but no Money or other Property has come into the possession of the Administrator, nor any Fees received thereon. The Property of several Estates consists of claims to land not yet determined:

Robert Dyson, T. B. McManus, John J. Coombs, C. E. Trask, Wm. F. Hamilton, Charles S. Norris, Huling Major, Horace Cole, James E. Calhoun, J. W. Phipps, Julia W. Burns.

The foregoing report includes all the Estates administered upon by me during the year ending June 30th, 1866.

As a number of the Estates are still unsettled, the amount of Fees cannot be stated, but the same will, on final settlement, be 4 per cent. upon the amount administered in each Estate.

All of which is respectfully submitted,
J. W. BRUMAGIM,
Public Administrator.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

BABY ON THE PORCH.

OUT on the porch, by the open door,
Sweet with rosee and cool with shade,
Baby ie creeping over the floor,—
Dear little winsome blue-eyed maid!

All about her the shadows dance,
All above her the roscs swing,
Sunbeams in the lattice glance,
Robins up in the branchee sing.

Up at the bloesoms her fingere reach,
Lisping her pleading in broken words,
Cooing away in ber tender speech,
Songs like the twitter of nestling birde.

Creeping, creeping over the floor,
Soon my birdie will find her wings,
Fluttering out at the open door,
Into the wonderful world of things.

A FAST STORY.

AN Englishman was bragging of the speed of English railroads, to a Yankee traveller seated at his side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in England. The engine bell was rung as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportuuity of "taking down his companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innocently inquired the Yankee.

"We are approaching a town," said the Englishman; "they have to commence ringiug about ten miles before they get to a station, or else the train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I suppose they haven't invented bells iu America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, we've got bells, but can't use them ou our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead of the sound; the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee, "had to give up bells. Then we tried steam whistles, but they wouldn't answer, either. I was on a locomotive when the whistle was tried. We were going at a tremendous rate; hurricanes were nowhere, and I had to hold my hair on. We saw a two-horse wagon crossing the track, about five miles ahead, and the engineer let the whistle on, screechiug like a trooper. It screamed awfully, but it wasn't no use. The next thing I knew, I was picking myself out of a pond by the roadside, amid the fragments of the locomotive, dead horses, broken wagon, and dead engineer lying beside me. Just then the whistle came along, mixed up with some frightful oaths that I had heard the engineer use when he first saw the horses. Poor fellow! he was dead before his voice got to him. After that we tried lights, supposing they would travel faster than sound. We got one so powerful that the chickens woke all along the road when we came by, supposing it to be morniug. But the locomotive kept ahead of it still, and was in the darkness with the light close on behind it. The inhabitants petitioned against it; they couldn't sleep with so much light in the night-time. Finally we had to station electric telegraphs along the road, with signal men to telegraph when the train was in sight; and I have heard that some of the fast trains beat the lightning fifteen minutes every forty miles. But I can't say as that is true; the rest I know to be so."

Two French peasants were discussing the continental war, when one attempted to explain to the other the nature of the telegraph. After repeatedly failing, he was struck with a brilliant notion, and exclaimed: "Imagine that the telegraph is an immensely long dog—so long that its head is at Vieuna and its tail at Paris. Well, tread on its tail., which is at Paris, and it will bark at Vienna. Do you understand now, stupid, what the telegraph is like?" "O, yes!" replied the other, "I have an idea now what a telegraph must be."

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure. but

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded or the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup

has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances

Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of

HAIR RESTORER.

THIS IS A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY, and stands above comparison with any other article for the Hair ever brought before the public.

A PERFECT

Hair Restorer AND Hair Dresser

BOTH COMBINED IN ONE.

First—It is not a Dye.
Second—Will not Color the Skin.
Third—Will restore Gray Hair to a beautiful Black, Brown, Auburn, or whatever might have been its original color, and cause it to assume its former beauty.
Fourth—Will cure all Humors and Diseases of the Scalp.
Fifth—Will remove Dandruff and Scurf from the head, and keep the hair moist and silk like in its appearance as in youthful days.
Sixth—Will promote a healthy growth.
Seventh—Will prevent it from falling off, and cause it to grow on bald heads where there is life and vitality at the roots, but where these are gone there is no hope of success.
Eighth—The best testimony that can be given will be found inside of each bottle.

Warranted to do all we claim for it, or the money refunded after using two bottles. Try it and be convinced.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

AYER'S Cathartic Pills,

ARE THE MOST PERFECT purgative which we are able to produce, or which we think has ever yet been made by anybody. Their effects have abundantly shown how much they excel the ordinary medicines in use. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. Their penetrating properties stimulate the vital activities of the body, remove the [illegible] of its organs, purify the blood, and expel disease. They purge out the foul humors which breed and grow distemper, stimulate sluggish or disordered organs into their natural action, and impart a healthy tone with strength to the whole system. Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases. While they produce powerful effects, they are at the same time, in diminished doses, the safest and best physic that can be employed for children. Being sugar-coated, they are pleasant to take; and, being purely vegetable, are free from any risk of harm. Cures have been made which surpass belief, were they not substantiated by men of such exalted position and character, as to forbid the suspicion of untruth. Many eminent clergymen and physicians have lent their names to certify to the public the reliability of our remedies, while others have sent us the assurance of their conviction that our Preparations contribute immensely to the relief of our afflicted, suffering fellow men.

The Agent below named is pleased to furnish gratis our American Almanac, containing directions for the use and certificates of their cures, of the following complaints:

Costiveness, Billious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache arising from foul stomach, Nausea, Indigestion, Morbid Inaction of the Bowels and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Diseases which require an evacuant medicine. They also, by purifying the blood and stimulating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach, such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability, Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout, and other kindred complaints arising from a low state of the body, or obstruction of its functions.

Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand AYER'S and take no others. The sick want the best aid there is for them, and they should have it.

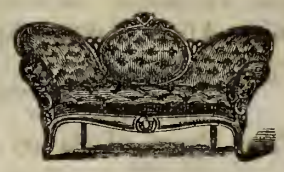
AGENTS WANTED TO CANVASS FOR THE only official Southern History of the War. THE LOST CAUSE, by E. A. Pollard, the popular Historian of the South, and editor of the Richmond Examiner during the war. Complete in one large royal octavo volume, with

24 FINE STEEL PORTRAITS,

giving a full and authentic account of the rise and fall of the late Southern Confederacy. Written under the encouragement of Generals R. E. Lee, Johnston, Beauregard and others. The work is being liberally patronized by leading men of all classes, eager to hear



"THE OTHER SIDE,"

and thus arrive at the truth of history, which it is impossible to do from the many histories written only from a Northern stand-point.

Agents and the public are cautioned against any other work purporting to be this one. To energetic men and women a rare chance is offered to make money. Don't fail to send for circulars of this great and important work. Address

LETTER FROM "MARK TWAIN."

HOW, FOR INSTANCE?

COMING down from Sacramento on the Capital the other night, I found, on a centre-table, a pamphlet advertisement of an Accident Insurance Company. It interested me a good deal, with its General Accidents, and its Hazardous Tables, and Extra Hazardous furniture of the same description, and I would like to know something more about it. It is a new thing to me. I want to invest if I come to like it. I want to ask merely a few questions of the man who carries on this Accident shop, if you think you can spare so much space to a far-distant stranger. I am an Orphan.

He publishes this list as accidents he is willing to insure people against.

GENERAL ACCIDENTS

include the Traveling Risk, and also all forms of Dislocations, Broken Bones, Ruptures, Tendons, Sprains, Concussions, Crushings, Bruising, Cuts, Stabs, Gunshot Wounds, Poisoned Wounds, Burns and Scalds, Freezing, Bites, Unprovoked Assaults by Burglars, Robbers or Murderers, the action of Lightning or Sunstroke, the effects of Explosions, Chemicals, Floods and Earthquakes, Suffocation by Drowning or Choking—where such accidental injury totally disables the person insured from following his usual avocation, or causes death within three months from the time of the happening of the injury.

I want to address this party as follows:

Now, Smith—I suppose likely your name is Smith—you don't know me and I don't know you, but I am willing to be friendly. I am acquainted with a good many of your family—I know John as well as I know any man—and I think we can come to an understanding about your little game without any hard feelings. For instance:

Do you allow the same money on a dog-bite that you do on an earthquake? Do you take special risks for specific accidents?—that is to say, could I, by getting a policy for dog-bites alone, get it cheaper than if I took a chance in your whole lottery? And if so, and supposing I got insured against earthquakes, would you charge any more for San Francisco earthquakes than for those that prevail in places that are better anchored down? And if I had a policy on earthquakes alone, I couldn't collect on a dog-bite, may be, could I?

If a man had such a policy, and an earthquake shook him up and loosened his joints a good deal, but not enough to incapacitate him from engaging in pursuits which did not require him to be tight, wouldn't you pay him some of his pension? I notice you do not mention Biles. How about biles? Why do you discriminate between Provoked and Unprovoked Assaults by Burglars? If a burglar entered my house at dead of night, and I, in the excitement natural to such an occasion, should forget myself and say something that provoked him, and he should cripple me, wouldn't I get anything? But if I provoked him by pure accident, I would have you there, I judge; because you would have to pay for the Accident part of it anyhow, seeing that insuring against accidents is just your strong suit, you know. Now that item about protecting a man against freezing is good. It will procure you all the custom you want in this country. Because, you understand, the people hereabouts have suffered a good deal from just such climatic drawbacks as that. Why, three years ago, if a man—being a small fish in the matter of money, went over to Washoe and bought into a good silver mine, they would let that man go on and pay assessments till his purse got down to about thirty-two Fahrenheit, and then the big fish would close in on him and freeze him out. And from that day forth you might consider that man in the light of a bankrupt community; and you would have him down to a spot, too. But if you are ready to insure against that sort of thing, and can stand it, you can give Washoe a fair start. You might send me an agency. Business? Why, Smith, I could get you more business than you could attend to. With such an understanding as that, the boys would all take a chance.

You don't appear to make any particular mention of taking risks on Blighted Affections. But if you should conclude to do a little business in that line, you might put me down for six or seven chances. I wouldn't mind expense—you might enter it on the Extra Hazardous. I suppose I would get ahead of you in the long run anyhow, likely. I have been blighted a good deal in my time.

But now as to those "Effects of Lightning." Suppose the lightning were to strike out at one of your men and miss him, and fetch another party—could that other party come on you for damages? Or could the relatives of the party thus suddenly snaked out of the bright world in the bloom of his youth come on you in case he was crowded for time? as of course he would be, you know, under such circumstances.

You say you have "issued over sixty thousand policies, forty-five of which have proved fatal and been paid for." Now, do you know, Smith, that that looks just a little shaky to me, in a measure? You appear to have it pretty much all your own way, you see. It is all very well for the lucky forty-five that have died "and been paid for," but how about the other fifty-nine thousand nine hundred and fifty-five?" You have got their money, haven't you? but somehow the lightning don't seem to strike them and they don't get any chance at you. Won't their families get fatigued waiting for their dividends? Don't your customers drop off rather slow, so to speak?

You will ruin yourself publishing such damaging statements as that, Smith. I tell you as a friend. If you had said that the fifty-nine thousand nine hundred and fifty-five died, and that forty-five lived, you would have issued about four tons of policies the next week. But people are not going to get insured, when you take so much pains to prove that there is such precious little use in it. Good-bye, Smith!

Yours, MARK TWAIN.

IMPORTANCE OF FRESH AIR.—The more air a man receives into his lungs in ordinary breathing, the more healthy he is likely to be; because an important object in breathing is to remove impurities from the blood. Each breath is drawn pure into the lungs; on its going out the next instant it is so impure, so perfectly destitute of nourishment, that if rebreathed without any admixture of a purer atmosphere, the man would die. Hence, one of the conditions necessary to secure a high state of health is, that the rooms in which we sleep should be constantly receiving new supplies of fresh air through open doors, windows, or fireplaces.

If a person's lungs are not well developed, the health will be imperfect, but the development may be increased several inches in a few months by daily out-door runnings with the mouth closed, beginning with twenty yards and back at a time, increasing ten yards every week, until a hundred are gone over, thrice a day. A substitute for ladies and persons in cities, is running up stairs with the mouth close, which compels very deep inspirations, in a natural way, at the end of the journey.

NEW DEBATING CLUB.—An association of young men was recently formed in this city, under the title of "Adelphia Debating Club," for improvement in declamation and mental culture. The following officers were chosen: J. B. Gallagher, President; Frank Kast, Vice President; Arthur K. Hawkins, Treasurer.

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES,

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, a gambler and spendthrift, walks down from London to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs. Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother, which results in his obtaining a ten-pound note, and a promise that she will forward him, within one month, a hundred and fifty pounds, to meet a note of indebtedness to one Routh, a friend and associate. After an interview of half an hour he leaves for the adjacent village of Amherst, where he passes the night. In the morning he changes the note, which bears a date and the post mark of Amherst, to purchase an overcoat, and departs for London.

CHAPTER III.

THE PHILISTINES.

IN the front room of the first floor of a house in London, South Molton street, connecting Oxford street the plebeian with Brook street the superb, just as the feeble glimmer of daylight which had vouchsafed itself during the day was beginning to wax even feebler, previous to its sudden departure, a man sat astride a chair, sunk in thought. He had apparently just entered, for he still wore his hat and overcoat, though the former was pushed to the back of his head, and the latter thrown negligently open. He was a tall, handsome man, with keen black eye glancing sharply, with thick black brows, a long straight nose, thin tight lips unshrouded by moustache or beard, and a small round chin. He had full flowing black whiskers, and the blue line round his mouth showed that the beard was naturally strong; had he suffered it to grow, he might have passed for an Italian.

As it was, there was no mistaking him for anything but an Englishman,—darker, harder-looking than most of his race, but an Englishman. His face, especially round the eyes, was flushed and marked and lined, telling of reckless dissipation. There was a something not exactly fast, but yet slangy, in the cut of his clothes and in the manner in which he wore them. His attitude as he sat at the window, with his hands clasped in front of him over the back rail of his chair, his knees straight out and his feet drawn back, as a man sits a horse at a hunt, was in its aspect suggestive of the mess-room—in its worst, of the billard-room. And yet there was an indescribable something in the general aspect of the man, in the very ease of his position, in the shape of the hands clasped in front of him, in the manner, slight as it was, in which now and again he would turn on his chair and peer back into the darkness behind him, by which you would have known that he had had a refined education, and had been conversant with the manners of society.

Nor would you have been wrong. In "Burke's Landed Gentry," the Rouths of Carr Abbey take up their full quota of pages; and when the county election for Herefordshire comes off, the liberal agent is forced to bring to bear all the science he can boast of, to counteract the influence which the never-failing adhesion of the old family throws into the Tory scale. Never having risen, never for an instant having dreamed of demeaning themselves by rising, above the squirearchy, owners of the largest and best herds in all that splendid cattle-breeding county, high sheriffs and chairmen of quarter-sessions as though by prescriptive right, perpetual presidents of agricultural societies, and in reality taking precedence immediately after the lord-lieutenant, the Rouths of Carr Abbey, from time immemorial, have sent their sons to Oxford, and their daughters to court, and have never, save in one instance, had to blush for their children.

Save in one instance. The last entry in the old family Bible of Carr Abbey is erased by a thick black line. The old Squire speaks habitually of "My only son, William;" and should a stranger, dining at the Abbey, casually refer to the picture, by Lawrence, of two little boys, one riding a pony, the younger decking a dog's neck with ribbon, he is, if the Squire has not heard his question, motioned in dumb show to silence, or is replied to by the Squire himself that "that boy is—lost, sir."

That boy, Stewart Routh, the man looking out of the window in South Molton street, was captain of the boat at Eton, and first favorite, for a time, both with the dons and undergraduates at Oxford. Rumors of high play at cards developing into fact of perpetually sported "oak," non-attendance at chapel, and frequent shirking of classes, lessened the esteem in which Mr. Routh was held by the authorities; and a written confession handed to the Dean, after being obtained by parental pressure from Mr. Albert Gruntz of Christ Church, son of and heir to Mr. Jacob Gruntz, sugar-baker, of St. Mary Axe, in the city of London, and Balmoral Gardens, Hyde Park—a confession to the effect that he, Mr. A. Gruntz, had lost the sum of two thousand pounds to Mr. S. Routh, at a game played with dice, and known as French Hazard—procured the dismissal of Mr. S. Routh from the seat of learning. At Carr Abbey, whither he retired, his stay was shortened by the arrival of another document from Oxford, this time signed by Lord Hawkhurst, gentleman commoner of Christ Church, and Arthur Wardroper of Balliol, setting forth that Mr. S. Routh, while playing Hazard in Mr. Gruntz's rooms, had been caught there in flagrante delicto in the act of cheating by "securing," i. e. retaining in his fingers, one of the dice which he should have shaken from the box. It was the receipt of this letter that caused the Squire to make the erasure in the family Bible, and to look upon his youngest son as dead.

Driven from the paternal roof, Mr. Stewart Routh descended upon the pleasant town of Boulogne, whence, after a short stay not unmarked by many victories over the old and young gentlemen who frequent the card-tables at the Etablissement des Bains, from whom he carried off desirable trophies, he proceeded to the baths and gambling-houses of Ems, Homburg, and Baden-Baden. It was at the last mentioned place, and when in the very noon and full tide of success, that he was struck down by a fever, so virulent that the affrighted servants of the hotel refused to wait upon him. No nurse could be prevailed upon to undertake to attend him; and he would have been left to die for want of proper care, had not a young Englishwoman, named Harriet Creswick, travelling in the capacity of nursery-governess to Lord de Maulever's family (then passing through Baden on their way to winter in Rome), come to the rescue. Declaring that her countryman should not perish like a dog, she there and then devoted herself to attendance on the sick man. It need scarcely be told that Lady de Maulever, protesting against "such extraordinary conduct," intimated to Miss Creswick that her connection with her noble charges must cease at once and forever. But it is noteworthy that, in such a man as Stewart Routh had hitherto proved himself, a spirit of gratitude should have been so strongly aroused that, when his sense and speech returned to him, in weak and faltering accents he implored the woman who had so tenderly nursed him through his illness to become his wife.

It is quite needless to say that his friends, on hearing of it, severed, some that he thought he was going to die, and that it did not matter to him what he did, while it might have pleased the young lady; others, that he was a particularly knowing card whose brains had never deserted him, even when he was at his worst, and that he had discovered in Harriet Creswick a woman exactly fitted, by physical and mental qualifications, efficiently to help him as his partner in playing the great game of life. Be it as it may—and people will talk, especially in such circles—the fact remains, that on his sick couch at the Hollandischer Hof, Baden-Baden, Stewart Routh proposed to Harriet Creswick, and was accepted; that, so soon as he could safely be left, she departed for England; and that within a month they were married in London.

Of that one event at least in all his eventful life Stewart Routh had never repented. Through all his vicissitudes of fortune his wife had been by his side, and as, in the long run, chance had been against him, taking the heaviest portion of his burden on herself. Harriet Routh's was an untiring, undying, unquestioning love or worship of her husband. The revelation of his—to say the least of it—loose mode of life, the shifts and expedients to which he resorted for getting money, the questionable company in which he habitually lived, would have told with fatal effect on a devotion less thorough, a passion more transient. Harriet herself, who had been brought up staidly at an Institution which she had only quitted to join the family with whom she was travelling when she arrived at Baden—Harriet herself at first shrunk back stunned and stupified by the revelations of an unknown life which burst upon her a few days after her marriage. But her love bore her through it. As the dyer's hand assimilates to that it works in, so gradually did Harriet Routh endue herself with her husband's tone, temper, and train of thought, until, having become almost his second self, she was his most trusted ally, his safest counsellor in all the strange schemes by which he made out life. In the early days after their marriage she had talked to him once, only once, and then but for a few minutes, of reformation, of something better and more reputable, of doing with less money, to be obtained by the exercise of his great talents in some legitimate manner. And her husband, with the nearest approach to harshness that before or since he had assumed, told her that his time for that kind of thing was past and gone forever, that she must forget all the childish romance that they had taught her at the Institution, that she must sink or swim with him, and be prepared to cast in her lot with that kind of existence which had become his second nature, and out of which he could never hope to move. Even if he could move from it, he added, he did not think that he would wish to do so, and there must be an end to the matter.

There was an end to the matter. From that time forth Harriet Routh buried her past, buried her former self, and devoted herself, soul and body, to her husband. Her influence over him strengthened with each year that they lived together, and was traceable in many little ways. The fact once faced, that their precarious livelihood was to be earned by the exercise of sharpness superior to that enjoyed by those with whom they were brought in contact, Harriet laid herself out at once for the fulfilment of her new duties, and in a very short time compelled her husband's surprised laudation of the ease and coolness with which she discharged them. There were no other women in that strange society; but if there had been Harriet would have queened it over them, not merely by her beauty, but by her bright spirit, her quick appreciation, her thorough readiness to enter exactly into the fancy of the moment. The men who lost their money to Routh and his companion treated her not merely with a punctilio which forbade the smallest verbal excess, but treated their losses with comparative good-humor so long as Mrs. Routh was present. The men who looked up to Routh as the arch concocter of and prime mover in all their dark deeds, had a blind faith in her, and their first question, on the suggestion of any scheme, would be "what Mrs. Routh thought of it." Ah, the change, the change! The favorite pupil of the Institution, who used to take such close notes of the sermon on Sunday mornings, and illustrates the chaplain's meaning with such apposite texts from other portions of Scripture, as quite to astonish the chaplain himself. The show pupil of the Institution, who did all kinds of arithmetical problems "in her head," by which the worthy instructors meant without the aid of paper and pencil—the staid and decorous pupil of the Institution, who, when after her last examination she was quitting the table loaded with prizes—books—was called back by the bishop of the diocese, who with feeble hands pinned a silver medal on to her dress, and said, in a trembling voice, "I had nearly forgotten the best of all. This is in testimony of your excellent conduct, my dear." What was become of this model miss? She was utilizing her talents in a different way. That was all. The memory which had enabled her to summarize and annotate the chaplain's sermons now served as her husband's notebook, and was stored with all kinds of odd information—"good things" to "come off," trials of horses, names and fortunes of heirs who had just succeeded to their estates, lists of their most pressing debts, names of the men who were supposed to be doubtful in money matters, and with whom it was thought inexpedient to bet or play—all these matters dwelt in Harriet Routh's brain, and her husband had only to turn his head and ask, "What is it, Harry?" to have the information at once. The arithmetical quickness stood her in good stead, in the calculation of odds on all kinds of sporting events, on the clear knowledge of which the success of most of Routh's business depended; and as for the good conduct—well, the worthy bishop would have held up his hands in pious horror at the life led by the favorite pupil of the Institution, and at her surroundings; but against Mrs. Routh, as Mrs. Routh, as the devoted, affectionate, self-denying, spotless wife, the veriest ribald in all that loose crew had never ventured to breathe a doubt.

Devoted and affectionate! See her now as she comes quietly into the room—a small, compact partridge of a woman with deep blue eyes in a very pale face, with smooth shining light brown hair falling on either side in two long curls, and gathered into a clump at the back of her head, with an impertinent nose only just redeemed from being a snub, with a small mouth, and a very provoking, pattable chin. See how she steals behind her husband, her dark linsey dress draping her closely and easily, and not making the slightest rustle; her round arm showing its symmetry in her tight sleeve twining round his neck; her plump, shapely hand resting on his head; her pale cheek laid against his face. Devoted and affectionate! No simulation here.

"Anything gone wrong, Stewart?" she asked, in a very sweet voice.

"No, dear. Why?" said Routh, who was now sitting at a table strewn with papers, a pen in his right hand, and his left supporting his handsome, worn face.

"You look gloomy, I thought; but, if you say so, it's all right," returned his wife, cheerfully, leaving his side as she spoke, and proceeding to sweep up the hearth, put on fresh coals, and make the whole room look comfortable, with a few rapid, indefinable touches. Then she sat down in a low chair by the fire, perfectly still, and turned her calm, pale face to her husband with a business-like air. He made some idle scratches with his pen in silence, then threw it down, and, suddenly pushing away his chair, began to walk up and down the room with long, light strides.

"What do you make of Deane, Harriet?" he said, at length, stopping for a moment opposite his wife, and looking closely at her.

"How do you mean? In character or in probabilities? As regards himself, or as regards us?"

"Well, both. I cannot make him out; he is so confoundedly cool, and so infernally sharp. He might be a shrewd man of business, bent on making a fortune, and a good way on the road to his object; and yet he's nothing but a man of pleasure, of what your good people would call a wretched low kind of pleasure too, and is spending the fortune instead."

"I don't think so, Stewart," his wife said, quietly and impressively. "I don't think Mr. Deane is spending any very considerable portion of his fortune, whatever it may be."

Stewart had resumed his walking up and down, but listened to her attentively.

"I regard him as a curious combination of the man of business with the man of pleasure. I don't know that we have ever met exactly the kind of person before. He is as calculating in his pleasures as other men are in their business."

"I hate the man," said Routh, with an angry frown and a sullen gesture.

"That's dangerous, Stewart," said Harriet. "You should not allow yourself either to hate or to like any one in whom you are speculating. If you do the one, it will make you incautious; if you do the other, scrupulous. Both are unwise. I do not hate Mr. Deane."

"Fortunately for him, Harry. I think a man would be a great deal safer with my hatred than with yours."

"Possibly," she said, simply, and the slightest smile just parted her crimson lips, and showed a momentary gleam of her white, small, even teeth. "But I do not hate him. I think about him, though; because it is necessary that I should, and I fancy I have found out what he really is."

"Have you, by Jove?" interrupted Routh. "Then you've done a clever thing, Harriet—clever even for you; for of all the close and impenetrable men I ever met, Deane's the closest and the hardest. When I'm with him, I always feel as if he were trying to do me somehow, and as if he would succeed too, though that's not easy. He's as mean as a Scotch shopkeeper, as covetous as a Jew, as wide awake as a Yankee. There's a coolness and a constant air of avowed suspicion about him that drives me mad."

"And yet you ought to have been done with temper and with squeamishness long ago," said Harriet, in a tone of quiet conviction. "How often have you told me, Stewart, that to us, in our way of life, every man must be a puppet, prized in proportion to the readiness with which he dances to our pulling? What should we care? I am rendered anxious and uneasy by what you say."

She kept silence for a few moments, and then asked him, in a changed tone—

"How does your account with him stand?"

"My account!—ah, there's the rub! He's so uncommonly sharp, that there's little to be done with him. The fellow's a blackguard—more of a blackguard than I am, I'll swear, and as much of a swindler, at least, in his capacity for swindling. Only I dare say he has never had occasion to reduce it to practice. And yet there's a hardly veiled insolence in his manner to me, at times, for which I'd like to blow his brains out. He tells me, as plainly as if he said it in words that he pays me a commission on his pleasures, such as are of my procuring, but that he knows to a penny what he intends to pay, and is not to be drawn into paying a penny more."

Harriet sat thoughtful, and the faintest flush just flickered on her cheek. "Who are his associates, when he is not with you?"

"He keeps that as close as he keeps everything else," replied Routh; "but I have no doubt he makes them come cheap, if indeed he does not get a profit out of them."

"You are taking my view of him, Stewart," said Harriet; then she added, "He has some motive for acting with such caution, no doubt; but a flaw may be found in his armor, when we think fit to look for it. In the mean time, tell me what has set you thinking of him."

"Dallas' affair, Harriet. I am sorry the poor fellow lost his money to him. Hang it, I'm such a bad fellow myself, so utterly gone a 'coon," (his wife winced, and her pale face turned paler,) "that it comes ill from me to say so, and I wouldn't, except to you. But I am devilish sorry Deane got the chance of cleaning Dallas out. I like the boy; he's a stupid fool, but not half bad, but he didn't deserve such an ill turn of fortune."

"Well," said Harriet, "take comfort in remembering that you helped him."

She spoke very coldly, and evidently was a stranger to the feelings which actuated Routh.

"You don't care about it, that's clear," he remarked.

He was standing still now, leaning against the mantelpiece. She rose and approached him.

"No, Stewart," she said, in her calm, sweet voice, which rose a little as she went on, "I do not. I care for nothing on earth (and I never look beyond this earth) but you. I have no interest, no solicitude, for any other creature. I cannot feel any, and it is well Nothing but this would do in my case."

She stood and looked at him with her deep blue eyes, with her hands folded before her, and with a sober seriousness in her face confirmatory of the words she had spoken. He looked at her until she turned away, and a keen observer might have seen in his face the very slightest expression of impatience.

"Shall we go into those accounts now?" said Harriet; "we shall just have time for it, before you go to Flinder's."

She sat down, as she spoke, before a well-appointed writing-table, and, drawing a japan box towards her, opened it, and took out a number of papers. Routh took a seat beside her, and they were soon deep in calculations which would have had little interest or meaning for a third person, had there been one present. By degrees Routh's face darkened, and many times he uttered angry oaths; but though Harriet watched him narrowly, and felt in every nerve the annoyance under which he was laboring, she preserved her calm manner, and went steadily on with her task; condensing the contents of several papers into brief memoranda, carefully tearing up the originals, and placing the little heaps methodically beside her for consignment to the fire. At length Routh again stood up, and lounged against the mantelpiece.

"All these must be paid, then, Harry?" he asked as he lighted a cigar, and began to smoke sullenly.

"Yes," she answered, cheerfully. "You know, dear, it has always been our rule, as it has hitherto constituted our safety, to stand well with our trades-people, and pay them, at least, punctually. We have never been so much behind hand; and as you are about to take a bolder flight than usual, it is doubly necessary that we should be untrammelled. Fancy Flinders getting snubbed by the landlady, or your being arrested for your tailor's bills, at the time when the new Company is coming out!"

"Hang it! the bills all seem to be mine," growled Routh. "Where are yours? Haven't you got any?"

It would have been difficult to induce an unseen witness to believe how utterly unscrupulous, remorseless, conscienceless a woman Harriet Routh had become, if he had seen the smile with which she answered her husband's half-admiring, half-querulous question.

"You know, dear, I don't need much. I have not to keep up appearances as you have. You are in the celebrated category of those who cannot afford to be anything but well dressed. It's no matter for me, but it's a matter of business for you."

"Ah! I might have known you'd have some self-denying, sensible reason ready; but the puzzle to me is, that you always are well dressed. By Jove, you're the neatest woman I know, and the prettiest!"

The smile upon her face brightened, but she only shook her head, and went on—

"If Dallas does not get the money, or at least some of it, what do you propose to do? I don't know."

"Do you think he will get the money, Harry? He told you all about it. What are the odds?"

"I cannot even guess. All depends on his mother. If she is courageous, and fond of him, she will get it for him, even supposing her immediate control as small as he believes it to be. If she is not courageous, her being fond of him will do very little good, and women are mostly cowards," said Harriet, composedly.

"I never calculated much on the chance," said Routh, "and indeed it would be foolish to take the money if he got it—in that way, at least; for though I am sorry Deane profited by the young fellow, that's because I hate Deane. It's all right, for my purposes, that Dallas should be indebted as largely as may be to me. He's useful in more ways than one; his connection with the press serves our turn, Harry, doesn't it? Especially when you work it so well, and give him such judicious hints, such precious confidences."

(Even such praise as this, tho woman's perverted nature craved and prized.) "You won't need to take the money from him in formal payment," she said, "if that's what you want to avoid. If he returns with that sum in his pocket, he will not be long before he—"

A knock at the door interrupted her, and George Dallas entered the room.

He looked weary and dispirited, and, before the customary greetings had been exchanged, Routh and Harriet saw that failure had been the result of experiment. Harriet's eyes sought her husband's face, and read in it the extent of his discomfiture; and the furtive glance she turned on Dallas was full of resentment. But it found no expression in her voice, as she asked him commonplace questions about his journey, and busied herself in setting a chair for him by the fire, putting hat aside, and begging him to take off his overcoat. He complied. As he threw the coat on a chair, he said, with a very moderately successful attempt at pleasantry—

"I have come back richer than I went, Mrs. Routh, by that elegant garment, and no more."

"Bowled out, eh?" asked Routh, taking the cigar from his mouth, and laying it on the mantelpiece.

"Stumped, sir," replied Dallas.

Harriet said nothing.

"That's bad, Dallas."

"Very bad, my dear fellow, but very sure. Look here," the young man continued, with earnestness, "I don't know what to do. I don't, upon my soul! I saw my mother—"

"Yes?" said Harriet, going up to his side. "Well?"

"I saw her, and—and she is unable to help me; she is, indeed, Mrs. Routh," for a bitter smile was on Harriet's face, turned full upon him. "She hasn't the means. I never understood her position until last night, but I understood it then. She is—" he stopped. All his better nature forbade his speaking of his mother's position to those people. Her influence, the gentler, better influence, was over him still. However transitory it might prove, it had not passed yet. Harriet Routh knew as well as he did what the impulse was that arrested his speech.

"You will tell me all about it yet," she thought, and not a sign of impatience appeared in her face.

"I—I need not bore you with details," he went on. "She could not give me the money. She made me understand that. But she promised to get it for me, in some way or other, if the thing is within the reach of possibility, before a month expires. I know she will do it, but I must give her time, if it's to be forthcoming, and you must give me time."

"It's unfortunate, Dallas," Routh began, in a cold voice, "and, of course, it's all very well your talking to me about giving you time, but how am I to get it? It's no good going over the old story, you know it as well as I do. There, there," he said, shrugging his shoulders, "I must try and get old Shadrach to renew. I suppose we may as well go at once, Dallas." He left the room, followed by Harriet.

George Dallas sat over the fire in an attitude of deep dejection. He was sick at heart, and the revulsion of feeling that had begun at Poynings had not yet ceased. "If I could but be done with it all!" he thought. "But I'm in the groove, I'm in the groove."

"Come along, George," said Routh, who seemed more good-humored than before, as he re-entered the room, soberly attired, as became a man going to do business in the City. "Don't be down-hearted; the old lady will keep her word. Don't be afraid; and, in the mean time, we'll pull through. Put your coat on, and come along. You'll give us some dinner, Harriet, won't you? And if Deane calls, ask him to join us. He won't," he continued, with a laugh, "because he believes in tavern dinners, and puts no faith in ours. We're snobs who live in lodgings, George, you know; but he'll drop in in the evening fast enough."

The application to Mr. Shadrach proved successful, and George Dallas returned with Stewart Routh to his lodgings, more firmly tied to him than ever, by the strong bond of an increased money-obligation.

"Pretty tidy terms, weren't they?" Routh asked Dallas, when he had told Harriet, in answer to her anxious questioning, that the "renewal" had been arranged.

"Very tidy, indeed," said poor George, ruefully; "but, Routh, suppose when I do get the money, it's not enough. What's to be done then?"

"Never mind about then," said Routh, "now is the important matter. Remember that every then is made of nows, and keep your mind easy. That's philosophy," as Mr. Squeers says. "Your present business is to eat your dinner."

Stewart Routh had thrown off his low spirits, and had all but succeeded in rousing George Dallas from his. Kindly, convivial, only occasionally coarse, he was a dangerously pleasant man at all times, and especially so to George Dallas when Harriet was present; for then his coarseness was entirely laid aside, and her tact, humor, intelligence, never failed to please, to animate, and to amuse him. The dinner was a very pleasant one, and, before it had come to a conclusion, George Dallas began to yield as completely as ever to the influence of the man whose enviable knowledge of "life" had been the first medium through which he had attained it. George had forgotten the renewed bill and his late failure for a while, when the mention of Deane's name recalled it to his memory.

"Has Deane been here, Harry?" asked Routh.

"No, Stewart, I have been at home all day, but he has not called."

"Ah—didn't happen to want me, no doubt."

"Have you seen much of him lately, Routh?" inquired George Dallas. "I mean, within the last week or two? While I—while I've been keeping out of the way?" he said, with a nervous laugh.

"Poor boy, you have been down on your luck," said Routh. "Seen much of Deane? O yes; he's always about—he's here most days, sometime in the forenoon."

"In the forenoon, is he? Considering the hours he keeps at night, that surprises me."

"It doesn't surprise me. He's very strong—has a splendid constitution, confound him, and has not given it a shake yet. Drink doesn't seem to 'trouble' him in the least."

"He's an odd fellow," said George, thoughtfully. "How coolly he won my money, and what a greenhorn I was, to be sure! I wonder if he would have lost his own so coolly."

"Not a doubt of it," said Routh; "he'd have been satisfied he would make it up out of something else. He is an odd fellow, and a deuced unpleasant fellow, to my mind."

Harriet looked at her husband with a glance of caution. It was unlike Routh to dwell on a mere personal feeling, or to let so much of his mind be known unnecessarily. He caught the glance and understood it, but it only angered, without otherwise influencing him.

"A low-lived loafer, if ever there was one," he went on, "but useful in his way, Dallas. Every man has his weakness; his is to think himself a first-rate billiard player, while he is only a fourth-rate. A man under such a delusion is sure to lose his money to any one who plays better than he does, and I may as well be that man, don't you see?"

"I see perfectly," said George; "but I wish he had been equally mistaken in his notions of his card-playing science; it would have made a serious difference to me."

"Never mind, old fellow," answered Routh; "you shall have your revenge some day. Finish your wine, and Harriet shall give us some music."

She did so. She gave them some music, such as very few can give—music which combines perfection of art with true natural feeling. This woman was a strange anomaly, full of "treasons, stratagems, and spoils," and yet with music in her soul.

Rather early George left the pair, but they sat up late, talking earnestly. Things were going ill with Stewart Routh. Some if his choicest and most promising combinations had failed. He had once or twice experienced a not uncommon misfortune in the lot of such men as he—he had encountered men in his own profession who were as clever as himself, and who, favored by circumstances and opportunity, had employed their talents at his expense. The swindler had been swindled once or twice, the biter had been bitten, and his temper had not been improved in the process. He was about, as Harriet had said, to take a new flight, this time, in the direction of operations on the general public, and he had formed designs on Mr. Deane, which did not, in the increased knowledge he had obtained of that gentleman's character, and in the present aspect of affairs, look quite so promising as in the early stage of their acquaintance, six weeks before. The operations of gentlemen of the Routh fraternity are planned and executed with a celerity which seems extraordinary to pursuers of the more legitimate branches of industry.

Routh had not passed many hours in Mr. Deane's society (they had met at a low place of amusement, the honors of which Routh was doing to a young Oxonian, full of cash and devoid of brains, whom he had in hand just then), before he had built an elaborate scheme upon the slender foundation of that gentleman's boasted wealth and assumed greenness. His subsequent experience had convinced him of the reality of the first, but had shown him his mistake as to the last, and gradually his mind, usually cool and undaunted, became haunted by an ever-burning desire to possess himself of the money forever flaunted before his eyes—became haunted, too, by an unreasonable and blind animosity to the stranger, who combined profligacy with calculation, unscrupulous vice with well-regulated economy, and in unbridled indulgence of his passions with complete coldness of heart and coolness of temper. Routh had no knowledge of Deane's real position in life, but he had a conviction that had it been, like his own, that of a professional swindler, he would have been a dangerous rival, quite capable of reducing his own occupation and his own profits very considerably. Therefore Routh hated him.

When the conference between Routh and Harriet came to a conclusion, it left the woman visibly troubled. When Routh had been for some time asleep, she still sat by the table, on which her elbows rested, her head on her hands, and the light shining on her fair, brown hair. There she sat until the fire died out, and the late wintry dawn came. She was not unused to such watches; wakefulness was habitual to her, and care had often kept her company. But no vigil had ever tried her so much. Her mind was at work, and suffering. When at length she rose from her chair with an impatient shivor, dark circles were round her blue eyes, and her pure waxen complexion looked thick and yellow. She lighted a candle, turned the gas out, and went for a moment to the window. The cold gray light was beginning to steal through the shutter, which she opened wide, and then looked out. She set the candle down, and leaned idly against the window. Weariness and restlessness were upon her. The street was quite empty, and the houses opposite looked inexpressibly gloomy. "One would think all the people in them were dead instead of asleep," she said, half aloud, as she pulled the blind down with a jerk, and turned away. She went slowly up stairs to her bedroom, and as she went she murmured—

"Where will it end? How will it end? It is an awful risk!"

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications:]

OUR own leading literary journals seem to be uniting with the more supercilious class of British periodicals, in the task of rebuking our national vanity, and teaching us lessons of humility. Neither Blackwood nor the Saturday Review ever adopted a more disparaging tone in estimating American authors, and the aggregate value of their productions, than is now becoming habitual with a certain eminently "critical" class of Eastern periodicals. There seems to exist in the quarter indicated, a disposition to set the standard of excellence so fearfully high, as to render the chances of reaching it more desperate than those of drawing the first prize in the Havana lottery; and all who fail of winning the very highest distinction, are compassionated as examples of humiliating failure, if indeed they are not sharply rebuked for their presumption, and lectured on the sadness of the spectacle of men cursed with aspirations disproportioned to their powers.

In this exacting and unsympathetic spirit, the New York Nation deals with poor George Arnold in reviewing his poems. Even admitting the critic's verdict to be substantially just, there is an unnecessary hardness in its tone and manner of expression which, when we take into consideration Arnold's undoubted literary talent, his kindly character, and his recent death, seems to us quite foreign to the spirit in which one literary man should speak of another who has at least done some things well.

There are several ways in which an unfavorable judgment may be pronounced upon a volume of poems, which, while they fall short of a high standard of excellence, are not characterized by pretension or affectation; but we cannot conceive of any worse way than the following, which to us seems not merely harsh, in the ordinary sense, but so destitute of the kindliness of feeling natural under the circumstances, as to impress us as partaking of actual inhumanity:

GEORGE ARNOLD AS A POET.

In the sense in which we may call poets all men who are not duller than the clod, hopelessly imbruted—and, perhaps, in this meaning there are no total exceptions among all the tribes of men—George Arnold was a poet. The power, and beauty, and harmony, and mystery of nature—of nature in the widest signification of the word, the poetry of the microcosm as well as of the external world, the poetry which is everywhere, in all things, of which life is made, he, like others, could in part discern and could intermittently feel. To express it, to do hardly anything more than vaguely express his feeling of its existence, is beyond him, and although in every piece which he wrote there are indications of poetic sensibility, he has left behind him no single piece worthy the name of poem. He could not. He is no longer living, and he died when only thirty-one years old; but if at that age it was soon to do much, it was very late to be making beginnings, and, judging him by this book, before he could commence poet he would have had to begin over. There is no wealth of fancy in it, no depth of thought, no strength of passion, no peculiar felicities of rhythm or diction, no force of imagination nothing but that weak, half-morbid, melancholic sentiment of regret which preys upon the baffled poet who, having mistaken aspiration for inspiration and discovered his mistake, is without strength of judgment and power of self-restraint to impose silence on himself and set himself to labor in a new field. Mixed with this feeling is another, allied to it, which occasionally speaks in the verses—remorse, profitless repentance, real perhaps, perhaps feigned and poetical only, for years thrown away, opportunities and energies wasted in riotous or indolent self-indulgence, every labor undone, every duty disregarded, life left without dignity, till, as he says in "Recrimination:"

"Till the glass of your life is darkened, and darkly through it you see Broken and ghastly fragments of duty and destiny."

Then again, seeking refuge from this feeling, he naturally falls often into a cynical indifferentism which scorns fame, wealth, goodness, and badness, smokes a pipe in laziness, and pets a terrier—"Jack," of course, being kinder and more faithful in affection than man or any woman, and the smoke of the killikinick as substantial and as satisfying as the world of pleasure and business and human endeavor.

Evidently this is not a rare character which we have been describing, but one which is familiar and ordinary. To give it, with its narrow range and small depth and commonplaceness, such expression as should be noticeable among poetical utterances, would require far more than its own, more than common, force of genius.

Had the Nation been dealing with some inflated literary imposter, absolutely destitute of merit, and with no claim to respectful consideration, this tone might be unobjectionable. But George Arnold was a genuine member of the literary guild; and however humble his rank in it when compared with the few who have won the highest places, it is undeniable that not one man in a hundred of those devoted to literary pursuits ever reached the distinction he had worthily attained when he died at the age of thirty-one years. There is to our thinking something not only odious, but cruel, in those comparisons in which the claims of every aspirant are measured by a reference to the very highest standard of excellence. And we do not see why this course should be adopted with reference to literary effort exclusively. In other fields of endeavor, merit which is not the highest, is still recognized as merit. The respectable merchant, or lawyer, or physician, is not snubbed and sneered at because he has failed to gain the highest distinction in his business or profession, and more than an average roadster is consigned to the tannery and glue-factory because of his inability to complete with the favorits of the race-track.

The same journal thus sums up what has thus far been achieved in AMERICAN ART AND LITERATURE.

"During the eighty years of our independent national life we have produced but one great publicist, Hamilton, but one decided genius in literature, Hawthorne, but one in art, Allston, and only two great natural philosophers, Franklin and Rumford, and of these two Rumford spent the better part of his life and did all his scientific work in Europe. And as the quality of American contributions to literature and science has been, on the average, low, so has their quantity been small. The annual literary and scientific product of the people of the United States is not the twentieth part of that of any other civilized people. We read voraciously, but the bulk of our reading is of foreign origin. This is as true of our periodical publications in all departments of science and literature as of the books we consume. Reprinted or translated books and articles constitute ninety-nine hundredths of our reading matter. This aspect of our national life is humiliating, and has often suggested to sceptical minds, both at home and abroad, certain curious doubts concerning the effect on literature and science of a state of society in which there are neither depths nor heights, but only one common level."

We fear the Nation has set out to follow the sublimated "high critical" lead of the Round Table, though it enacts its cynical role in better taste and in a style that is at least free from absurd pretention and half-baked provincialism.

Mr. Heman Melville's re-appearance on the literary stage, after a silence of several years, has not been greeted with enthusiastic plaudits. The critics speak coldly of his volume of Battle Pieces, and seem generally indisposed to accord him recognition as a poet. The following has at least the merit of originality both in manner and treatment:

SHERIDAN AT CEDAR CREEK.

October, 1864.)

Shoe the steed with silver
That bore him to the fray
When he heard the guns at dawning,
Miles away;
When he heard them calling, calling,
Mount, nor stay;
Quick, or all is lost;
They've surprised and stormed the post,
They've pushed your routed host.
Gallop! retrieve the day.

House the horse in ermine—
For the foam-flake blew,
While through the red October
He thundered into view.
They cheered him in the looming,
Horseman and horse they knew.
The turn of the tide began,
The rally of hugles ran,
He swung his hat in the van,
The electric hoof-sparks flew.

Wreathe the steed and lead him—
For the charge he led Touched and turned the cypress
Into amaranths for the head
Of Philip, king of riders,
Who raised them from the dead.
The camp (at dawning lost),
By eve recovered—forced,
Rang with laughter of the host
As belated Early fled.

Shrond the horse in sable—
For the mounds the heap!
There is firing in the valley,
And yet no strife they keep;
It is the parting volley,
It is the pathos deep.
There is glory for the brave
Who lead and nobly save,
But no knowledge in the grave,
Where their nameless followers sleep.

A lyric with as much vigor and ring as that would have sufficed to make a literary reputation in the days when Halleck and Drake were in their prime. But times have changed since then.

The last number of the Edinburgh has an appreciative article on Barry Cornwall's new Memoir of Charles Lamb. If there is any value in posthumous lame, any value as real as there is in a comfortable and prosperous life, "poor Elia" is not after all a legitimate object of kindly commiseration. His life to be sure, was, according to the ordinary mode of estimation, one not to be envied, and the men he served regarded him as a poor drudge indebted to their patronage for an exemption from starvation. But now, the memory of the threadbare clerk is fresh and green, while those of the millionaires of the East Indian Company, as individuals, have perished. "Through the long, monotonous, servile years of his clerkship," says the reviewer, "it probably never came into his head that those masters of his, who were reigning over the distant millions of the East, would soon be utterly extinct and forgotten personages, while his own name would be so familiar to the popular literature of the country that no one would think of putting "Mr." to it.

It is in Barry Cornwall's "Memoir" that the story of Lamb's great misfortune is for the first time fully given to the world. All those out of respect for whose feelings the details have been so long withheld have passed away, and there is no longer any reason for silence.

The Review gives the outline of Lamb's "story" as follows:

About the end of 1795, three years after he obtained his appointment, his mother was ill and bedridden, his father almost fatuous, and he himself the inmate of the asylum at Hoxton, where, as he wrote to Coleridge, "his head ran upon him, as much almost as on another person who was the more immediate cause of my frenzy." Who this was is unknown: she remains only the "Alice W." of his poems, the object of a passion which might have blossomed into happy fruit but for the incidents of the next year. He returned home sane, and the family life went on as usual till the September of 1796. On the 23d of that month, his sister Mary, who had been for some time ill and moody, was seized just before dinner with a burst of madness. She seized a case-knife lying on the table, pursued a little girl (her apprentice) round the room, hurled about the dinner-forks so as to wound her father in the forehead, and, before Charles could snatch the knife from her hand, she had stabbed her mother to the heart. The sad publicity of a trial was somehow avoided. After the inquest Mary Lamb was removed to an asylum. She rapidly recovered her senses, and the question came what was then to be done. It seems to have been easier then than it now is to obtain the liberty of a dangerous lunatic, for no opposition to her release seems to have been made by the authorities. When becoming sane, Mary said, "she knew she must go to Bethlehem for life: one of her brothers would have it so; the other would not wish it, but would be obliged to go with the stream."

The following humoristic tribute to "the weed," is in Lamb's own vein, and reminds one of his "Farewell to Tobacco." It is from a volume entitled Verses and Translations by "Mr. Calverley."

Thou who, when fears attack,
Bidst them avaunt, and black
Care, at the horseman's back
Perching, unseatest;
Sweet, when the morn is grey,
Sweet, when they've cleared away
Lunch, and at close of day
Possibly sweetest.

I have a liking old
For thee, though manifold
Stories, I know, are told
Not to thy credit.
How one (or two at most)
Drops make a cat a ghost,
Useless, except to roast,
Doctors have said it.

How they who use fuzees
All grow by slow degrees
Brainless as chimpanzees,
Meagre as lizards:
Go mad, and beat their wives,
Plunge, after shocking lives,
Razors and carving knives
Into their gizzards!

Confound such knavish tricks:
Yet know I five or six
Smokers who freely mix
Still with their neighbors:
Jones (who, I'm glad to say,
Asked leave of Mrs. J.)
Daily absorbs a clay
After his labors.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

To the Editor of the Californian:

Can you inform me of what kind of stone the beautiful structure, now going up at the corner of Sansome and California streets, is built? Also, whether the current statement is true, that the design is taken from that of a public library at Venice? E.

The stone, we believe, is a kind of freestone found at Angel Island. As to the subject of the other query, we possess no information. We had supposed that the plans were original. If the Bank is a copy of any public building in Venice, the fact must be one that is well known to architects.

WHAT CONSTITUTES "A UNIVERSITY."

Messrs. Editors Californian:

Can you refer me to any book which will enable me to obtain an idea of the English University system? In reading English periodicals and works of fiction, I constantly meet with allusions to certain features of the University system or of University life, which are utterly unintelligible to me. In fact, I fear I have no very intelligible notion of what constitutes a University in the English sense.

San Francisco, Oct. 25th, 1866. W. S.

We cannot at this moment recall the name of any book on the subject. We think, however, that Charles Astor Bristed, and a son of the late Edward Everett, both of whom spent some years at one of the English Universities, have published works calculated to furnish the kind of information desired by W. S.

Possibly some of our readers may be able to supply the name of such a book as our correspondent inquires for.

HAVE WE A CATHEDRAL?

San Francisco, Oct. 26th.

Mr. Editor: Can you, or any of your readers, enlighten a seeker after knowledge, as to what is the essential difference between a church and a cathedral? Also, whether cathedrals are recognized in the ecclesiastical economy of the Protestant Episcopal church in the United States. Sigma.

The whole question involved in "Sigma's" inquiry was discussed at length, some two months since, in the Pacific Churchman, by a writer who seemed familiar with the subject. By addressing himself to that journal, "Sigma" can perhaps obtain a copy of the article.

THE "SONG OF JOY."

[Over the upper windows of a little cottage in Gohlis, Leipsic, are written the words, "Schiller's Study." The gate bears the following inscription:

Here dwelt
SCHILLER,
and wrote the Song of Joy,
in the year
1789.

How simple and touching a moral is here! In poverty, in distress, in want of friends and bread—an exile—a stranger—"here dwelt Schiller, and wrote the 'Song of Joy!'"]

The "Song of Joy!"
And were thy dreams so bright, thou gentle heart?
In thy lone hours,
With their admixture of a sad alloy—
Friendless, amid thy flowers,
Which could but smile, as if to mock thy fate,
With Poverty's dread smart
Stinging its deadliest—thou, so desolate,
Could'st tune the lyre to joy!

O, brave as pure!
How most exalted is a soul like thine!
High above earth's mere mould
Must he the mind which could like thine endure,
And so serenely fold
Life's weary burden to a tortured breast.
What element divine
Environed thee with such pervading rest,
So saintly and secure?

Had the applause that springs
From Fame place in the compass of thy thought?
Did some prophetic lip
Foretell the future?—the wind's whisperings
Tell of the cup thou should'st hereafter sip—
Breathe of a brilliance to be borne by thee,
When courtier throngs she'd bow before the sought,
The crowned of Poesy—
The favorite of Kings?

Ah, no! Immortal mind,
These are thy triumphs—this thy grand reward—
This the enchanter's wand with which thy sons
Can almost deify their kind;
Though the world frowned or smiled, thy chosen ones
Have ever learned to sing the Song of Joy;
And far above Life's petty ills have soared,
Unmoved by pain—unangered by annoy—
Divinely soul-enshrined.

WASHINGTON'S GENERALS.

A NEW AND COMPENDIOUS HISTORY.

AFTER THE MANNER OF M. ERNEST RENAN.

HISTORY in its true conception is neither a chronicle stuffed with facts, nor a chronology bristling with dates. Hence, the loftiest style of History—the philosophical and critical—eschews facts and dates altogether.

I, myself, have a sublime contempt for facts and dates. I reconstruct the Past from the slenderest remains of the Present by the aid of the Historical Imagination; and I do it as easily as Agassiz reconstructs an antediluvian monster from a fossil jaw-bone, or produces an accurate drawing of an extinct fish from a single scale.

One great advantage of my style of writing History is, that it saves a world of trouble both to author and reader. The former is relieved from the necessity of poring over musty records and antiquated authorities, while the latter absorbs learning by a process as agreeable as the perusal of M. Hugo's last novel.

The History of Washington's Generals rests mainly upon tradition. None of them have written their own histories; hence the accounts we have are more or less apocryphal. Tradition knows only heroes and monsters; it knows nothing of mere men. It paints its amiable characters as demigods, its evil ones as demons.

Thus Arnold, like Judas, is an ideal, if not a myth.

Judas was not a bad man; he was merely a credulous man with a good heart—a sentimentalist, an enthusiast.

True, he betrayed his master, but what of that? The bare fact has no significance to the philosophic mind. Facts are not truths. Why did he betray him? Was it because he loved him less than Peter or the rest of the disciples? I answer no. On the contrary, he loved him more than they all.

Was it the temptation of the thirty pieces of silver? Bah!

Judas betrayed him because of the greatness of his faith. He did not believe that it was in the power of his enemies to harm him. He laughed inwardly at the idea of their foolish and impotent machinations. How could the poor blind conspirators work any evil to the Son of God? How could he, Judas, "betray" him into their power?

The thing seemed preposterous to Judas. He esteemed them fools, as well as wicked machinators. He despised and laughed at them. He thought it but a just punishment to aid in bringing them to confusion. "I will take their thirty pieces," he said, "and the wretched dupes will realize how little either open force or secret treachery can accomplish against the Lord's anointed." Judas is popularly said to have "sold his Master." The fact is, he supposed he was "selling" his Master's enemies.

Arnold, like Judas, had an excess of faith. He smiled at the folly of the Briton who imagined that the possession of West Point would decide the fortunes of the struggle for independence. He did not believe that his treason could injure his country, and he therefore saw no harm in taking the money of his country's enemies. In short, he was a good man, whose sagacity was equal to his virtue. But, unlike Judas, he was no sentimentalist. He was not weak enough to give back the reward he had received, or to go and hang himself. In this we see his superiority. It is only feeble natures that are capable of repentance.

As to General Greene, the military achievements attributed to him are evidently apocryphal. The results of the latest critical investigations throw a flood of new light upon this subject. It is now well settled that Greene was a member of the sect of Quakers, who, as is well known, are non-combatants. The narratives, therefore, that represent him as commanding the American army, in divers battles of the Revolution, cannot be accepted as trustworthy. Here is another striking illustration of the manner in which the errors of history are detected by the strict application of critical principles.

Again, Gates is repeatedly referred to in these narratives as one of the leading American Generals; whereas, more recent researches show that he was an Englishman. The probability is that he commanded a division in Burgoyne's army.

Still another striking illustration of the unhistoric character of these so called "histories" may be found in the fact that they all, without exception, make mention of one "Lord Stirling" as among the number of the American Generals, and as being at one time in command on Long Island. A "Lord" acting as General on the rebel side! Yet this preposterous idea seems to have been received with unquestioning credulity.

But why occupy our time so unprofitably? Why dwell upon details of a pseudo-historical character, which carry upon their face the evidences of their untrustworthiness?

Whoever has intelligently followed me in the foregoing critical and philosophical investigation, knows all that is worth knowing of Washington's Generals. Here is History in a nutshell—the very cream of the Philosophy of History—History without a fact or a figure or a date!

NEW PLANTS.

Passiflora Hulletii—a beautiful stove climber, recently introduced from Rio Negro, on the banks of the Amazon; in growth much resembling Passiflora Quadrangularis—the leaves, which are very ornamental, being eight inches across; the flowers are large white, spotted with pink. Besides being a desirable addition to our flowering plants, it will no doubt prove to be one of our most valuable exotic dessert fruits, the flavor of it being so desirable that it has been pronounced superior to the pineapple. It requires to be grown in a warm, moist atmosphere.

Thunbergia Fragrans—The whole character is quite distinct to any other Thunbergia, and whether grown as a pot plant, or planted in the border for covering pillars and trellis-work, it will be invaluable, being free in growth, with ample foliage of a dark green of great substance. It continues flowering throughout the year; but its principal period is during the winter months—a time when white flowers are most required.

Swainsonia Magnifica—A free-growing and free-flowering green house climber, a native of Australia. The habit and character partakes both of the Clianthus and Swainsonia, whilst it has the robust and graceful-growing habit of the former, it produces more prominently the long, pendent racemes of delicate, bright-colored pink flowers of the latter, with a pure white centre in the upper petal or lobe. It is well adapted for a cool green-house, treated as pot plant, or planted out in a border for pillars or trellis-work.

Thujopsis Dolobrata—This rare and beautiful evergreen, from Japan, has proved hardy in the neighborhood of Boston, while many of the common varieties of native evergreens have been injured, and some killed. This is as beautiful as in its own native clime; both the variegated and plain seem equally enduring.

Retinospora pisifera aurea is not so hardy, but is well worthy of all the care and attention required to preserve it from excessive cold.

Taxus elegantissima, the Golden Yew—a tree which is always vivid and distinct in its varigation, and one of which no garden should be without.

Thuya Aurea, the Golden Arbor Vitæ—is also a beautiful evergreen with its golden tints.

Wigandia Caracasana—a large and fine plant for producing an effect.

Gynerium Argenteum, the Pampas Grass—is very ornamental, and blooms well in a warm, sheltered place.

Bambusa Gigantea—This plant is being very largely exported from Jamaica to New York, for the manufacture of paper. As much as 70 per cent. of clean fibre is obtained from it. It attains its full height of from 80 to 100 feet in three or four months' time, and the average growth during that period has been ascertained by measurement to be 8 inches in the 24 hours.

WHEN ALL MY SHIPS COME HOME FROM SEA.

When all my ships come home from sea,
What stores of treasure there will be!

O, winds that circle round the lea,
Touch tenderly my argosy;

Far richer than the golden fleece,
They hold the guerdon of my peace.

And one by one they float across
The magic mere of gain and loss,

The while I wait upon the beach,
And plead a safe return for each.

And when these ships come home from sea,
What treasure they will bring to me!

Spices and pearls and corals rare,
And Indian stuffs my love can wear;

Honey from Hybla's hill, and flowers,
Fresh as when plucked from Persian bowers;

Lotos blooms from the sacred Nile,
And fragrance from Calypso's isle.

And all that's bright and all that's sweet
Will make my life and love complete.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No. 3.

"Medicine Chests always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

Dr. Andrew Combe writes: "As often practiced by men of undoubted respectability, medicine is made so much a mystery, and is so nearly allied to, if not identified with, quackery, that it would puzzle many a rational looker-on to tell which is the one and which the other."

Dr. Houghton tells us that "modern water-cure took its origin at a time when it would really seem as if the science of medicine (so called) was rapidly sinking into a decline—not to say dying—of its own poisons."

"The file of every apothecary would furnish a volume of instances, where the ingredients of the prescriptions were fighting together in the dark."—Dr. Paris.

To the Sick.—Having an improved system of water-cure, Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, has been sustained by the intelligence of the people of this coast during the past fourteen years, and without the necessity of half a dozen removals a year. Experience, good judgment, and skill render a physician reliable.

Dr. Billing says: "I visited the different schools of medicine, and the students of each hinted, if they did not assert, that the other sects killed their patients."

"Thousands are slaughtered in quiet in the sick-room," said Franks.

Dr. Bourne's Baths.—The sick always know where to find this old and popular institution. Removed only twice in nearly twelve years. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

Dr. Reid said: "More infantile subjects are perhaps diurnally destroyed by the mortar and pestle than in the ancient Bethlehem fell victims in one day to the Herodian massacre."

Speaking of the Plague, Dr. Madden says: "In all our cases we did as other practitioners did—we continued to bleed, and the patients continued to die!"

The Way to a Cure by the new method is rendered much easier by taking one or more of Dr. Bourne's Baths, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, and to stay cured is far more certain to those who take the same course.

Sir Astley Cooper declared "the science of medicine was founded on conjecture, and improved by murder."

Dr. Brown said that he "wasted more than twenty years in learning, teaching, and diligently scrutinizing every part of medicine."

Nature hath her unchanging laws; obey them, and health is inevitable; break them, and pain and suffering is the consequence. Consult Dr. Bourne, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street. No charge. Avail yourself of his knowledge and use his glorious baths, etc., and health and happiness will be yours.

"Medicine seems one of those ill fated arts, whose improvement bears no proportion to its antiquity."—Sir Wm. Knighton.

Dr. Gregory says: "Medical doctrines are little better than stark, staring absurdities."

Ladies' Water Cure, (the Pioneer, and in fact only Water Cure in San Francisco,) No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, Dr. Bourne. This institution, permanently located in San Francisco more than fourteen years, is the only one which the people of this coast have sustained during that long period.

"There has been a great increase of medical men of late years, but, upon my life, diseases have increased in proportion," said the distinguished Dr. Abernethy.

Pacific Hygeian Home Water Cure, at Fountain Farm, near Oakland. Chartered and conducted according to the teachings of the Hydropathic College of New York, by the Pacific Hygeian Association (incorporated). B. J. Smith, M. D., Consulting Physician; R. S. Macbeth, M. D., Attending Physician; W. G. W Harford, Manager; H. Andrews, Business Agent. Office, Baths, and Lecture Hall No. 627 Sacramento street, between Montgomery and Kearny. Free Lectures every Tuesday and Friday evenings.

ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA.

[The following striking poem, by General William H. Lyttle, is republished by special request:]

I AM dying, Egypt, dying,
Ebbs the crimson life-tide fast,
And the dark Plutonian shadows
Gather on the evening blast;
Let thine arm, oh Queen, enfold me,
Hush thy sobs and bow thine ear,
Listen to the great heart secrets
Thou and thou alone must hear.

Though my scarred and veteran legions
Bear their eagles high no more,
And my wrecked and scattered galleys
Strew dark Actium's fatal shore,
Though no glittering guards surround me,
Prompt to do their master's will,
I must perish like a Roman,
Die the great Triumvir still.

Let not Cæsar's servile minions
Mock the lion thus laid low;
'Twas no foeman's arm that felled him,
'Twas his own that struck the blow—
His who, pillowed on thy bosom,
Turned aside from glory's ray—
His who, drunk with thy caresses,
Madly threw a world away.

Should the base plebeian rabble
Dare assail my name at Rome,
Where the noble spouse, Octavia,
Weeps within her widowed home,
Seek her; say the gods bear witness,
Altars, augurs, circling wings,
That her blood, with mine commingled,
Yet shall mount the throne of kings!

And for thee, star-eyed Egyptian!
Glorious sorceress of the Nile,
Light the path to Stygian horrors,
With the splendors of thy smile;
Give the Cæsar crowns and arches,
Let his brow the laurel twine,
I scorn the Senate's triumphs,
Triumphing in love like thine.

I am dying, Egypt, dying—
Hark! the insulting foeman's cry;
They are coming—quick, my falchion,
Let me front them ere I die.
Ah, no more amid the battle
Shall my heart exulting swell,
Isis and Osiris guard thee,
Cleopatra, Rome, farewell!

Life's Autumn.—Like the leaf, life has its fading. We speak and think of it with sadness, just as we think of the autumn season. But there should be no sadness at the fading of a life that has done well its work. If we rejoice at the advent of a new life, if we welcome the coming of a new pilgrim to the uncertainties of this world's way, why should there be so much gloom when all these uncertainties are past, and life at its waning wears the glory of a completed task? Beautiful as is childhood in its freshness and innocence, its beauty is that of untried life. It is the beauty of promise, of spring, of the bud. A holier and rarer beauty is the beauty which the waning life of faith and duty wears. It is the duty of a thing completed; and as men come together to congratulate each other when some great work has been achieved, and see in its concluding nothing but gladness, so ought we to feel when the setting sun flings back its beam upon a life that has answered well life's purpose. When the bud-drops are blighted, and the mildew blasts the early grain, and there goes all hope of the harvest, one may well be sad; but when the ripened year sinks amid garniture of autum flowers and leaves, why should we regret or murmur? And so a life that is ready and waiting for the "well done" of God, whose latest virtues and charities are its noblest, should be given back to God in uncomplaining reverence, we rejoicing that earth is capable of so much sadness, and is permitted such virtue.

Self-Dependence.—Many an unwise parent works hard, and lives sparingly all his life for the purpose of leaving enough to give his children a start in the world, as it is called. Setting a young man afloat with money left him by his relatives, is like tying a bladder under the arms of one who cannot swim; ten chances to one he will lose his bladders and go down to the bottom. Teach him to swim, and he will not need the bladders. Give your child a good education. See to it that his morals are pure, his mind cultivated, and his whole nature made subservient to the laws which govern man, and you will have given what will be of more value than the wealth of the Indies. You have given him a start which no misfortune can deprive him of. The earlier you teach him to depend upon his own resources and the blessing of God, the better.

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

BONNETS.—The great variety of shapes brought out last season seems at last to have exhausted the invention of even the Parisian milliners; for really there is but little novelty among fall and winter styles. Crowns and skirts are still ignored, and bonnets are really not bonnets, but bona fide hats. The Lamballe still holds its sway, but greatly modulated and varied. There is the round, the pointed, and, newer than all, the square Lamballe. The last has for its individual cognomen the name Italian, and very much resembles the head covering worn by peasants in Italy. This bonnet is not a perfect square, but rather a parallelogram, being longer from front to back, than from side to side. This parallelogram, whether of silk or velvet or of straw, is trimmed on all its four sides, while the centre is left entirely plain. This bordering is sometimes a wreath of artificial flowers, but oftener of flowers of jet. The front of this unique hat fits closely to the forehead, excluding the slightest vestige of a ruche or other face trimming. The round and pointed Lamblles differ from the Italian not only in shape but in trimming, the centre instead of the sides being the place where trimming is profusely displayed. Large stars, either of flowers or of jet, or a combination of both, are placed on top and in the centre of these, and there is also a narrow band of velvet on the forehead by way of face trimming to which pendants of jet are attached.

In trimmings the Benoiton chains and immense cameos of are last season happily banished. In lieu of these there are various ornaments in jet and crystal, and in pearl. It would have been a difficult matter to have found on exhibition yesterday a single bounet in which these ornaments did not form a conspicuous part. On many French hats there are streamers of real blonde lace, on others there are, falling from the chin, the braids de Maintenon, or long loops of a thick velvet piping, on which flowers are placed, and yet again there are long floating ribbons beaded with jet. Delicate marabout feathers are more used than for many years past. In artificial flowers there is the same partiality as was exhibited during the summer for autumn flowers, and especially for the "sere and yellow leaves" that tell us "that melancholy days have come." Chrysanthemums and dablinas are popular, and among other flowers seldom imitated by art the nasturtion has been copied this season with great success. Clusters of red berries are mingled with the russet leaves of winter, and many other striking contrasts meet the eye.

When asked in regard to leading colors, the milliners all say that the furore for black will this winter eclipse any thing ever known before. It is also predicted that garnet will be even more wore than it was last winter. Cuir, it is said, will be revived; not the pale shabby tint worn a year or two since, but a new and beautiful shade.

The Ristori is a small bonnet exceedingly short in the front piece, but with a flat crown and a fall of lace to simulate a skirt. One that attracted special attention was of Helena blue velvet, with a fall of point lace attached to the crown. A long Marabout feather falls from the front backward on the left side. Ornaments of cut steel are fastened to the crown, and a velvet band at the forehead finishes off the handsome novelty.

Another style called the incroyable, was a combination of green velvet and real blonde lace. A wreath of green velvet leaves clambered over this stylish hat, in which crystals were intermingled.

The evening hat, a fanchonette, was of blonde, completely covered with marabout feathers. This fairy thing had a band of scarlet velvet in front, with pendant scarlet feathers by way of face trimming. The Lady Don, introduced by this house, a bonnet exceedingly neat, stylish. and suitable for the promenade, was of French gray felt, with a rosette in the centre of green velvet, surmounted by a jet ornament. This hat very much resembles the Italian in shape, being oblong, but is more rounded in front and back.

Dresses.—Among materials for dresses, striped and plaid goods are found in greater prevalence than was ever before known. Ladies have their choice either to be striped, like zebras, or plaided, like a Highlander, in as great a variety of colors as was Joseph's famous coat. There is nothing especially new in these styles, plaids are larger and more brilliant, and we see but few patterns in the modest combination of blue and green so much worn last season. Few broad stripes are seen. Many handsome patterns have a stripe of mazarine blue, or of garnet, or a rich gray, alternating with a plaid stripe of the same width in the brightest and gayest colors.

In plain colors there is a handsome article of silk velour. The rep being exceedingly heavy, makes the goods hang in elegant folds.

Gored dresses will continued to be worn, but with various modifications. The Gabrielle is gradually giving place to skirts with more plaits about the waist—plaits behind and at the side, but none in front. Walking dresses are to be made quite short, sometimes displaying the jupon beneath, and others reaching to the ankle. yet dispensing with loopers. This is a style that will scarcely predominate as few ladies have dresses made merely for the street, preferring to loop them up when walking and allow them to trail in the house. The Spanish flounce is exceedingly popular. This is a gored skirt, having all the widths except the front one cut off at the knee, and finished by a wide flounce set in box plaits. When the material is striped the flounce is bias, giving a very handsome effect.

Corsages are made round, short in the waist, exceedingly high at the throat, and long on the shoulders. Pointed corsages are only used for evening dress. Belts of medium width are made of the same material as the dress and trimmed to match. They are fastened with a clasp or with rosettes, buckles being no longer used. When chemisettes are worn the corsage is either turned over at the neek in a rolling collar or it is festooned only at the throat and belt, leaving the chemisette in view between.

Basques are universally popular, though now seldom fastened to the waist. A plain gored dress is suitable only to the house, but is easily adopted to the street by a basque skirt being appended to a belt of the same material as the dress. It is really not in good taste to wear a belt over a plain waist, but in this case it is so convenient that the end justifies the means, and for once appearance is sacrificed for utillity. Basques added in this manner are usually made very short on the hips, with long sharp points in front and back.

The much talked of peplum in a loose sack of various lengths, though seldom made as short as the loose jacket of last winter. Indeed there is a perceptible desire to lengthen wrappings of every description. The only novelty about the peplum is that it is cut with long points at the hips, and square in front and back. It is made of the same material as the dress, or in cloth, silk, cashmere or velvet. When made in white cashmere and trimmed with jet or with crystal beads it forms a handsome evening wrapping.

MARRIAGE IN EGYPT.

WHEN an Egyptian wants a wife, he is not allowed to visit the harems of his friends to select one, for Mohammed forbade men to see the face of any woman they could marry, that is to say, any besides their mother or sisters. A man is, therefore, obliged to employ a "khatbeh," or matchmaker, to find one for him, for which services of course she expects "backsheesh"—that is, payment. The khatbeh, having found a girl, recommends her to the man as exceedingly beautiful, and eminently suitable to him. The father is then waited upon to ascertain the dowry he requires; for all wives are purchased, as they were in patriarchal days. When Jacob had no money to pay for Rachel, he served her father seven years as an equivalent; and, when duped, was obliged to serve a second term to secure the prize. (Gen. xxix.) Fathers still refuse to give a younger daughter in marriage before an elder shall have been married. The people of Armenia, in Asiatic Turkey, forbid a younger son to marry before an elder; and this is likewise the law of the Hindoos.

PRICE OF A WIFE.

The price of a wife varies from five shillings to fifteen hundred dollars. The girl may not be more than five or six years old, but, whatever her age, two-thirds of the dowry is at once paid to the father, in the presence of witnesses. The father then, or his representative, says, "I betroth to thee my daughter," and the young man responds, "I accept of such betrothal." Unless among the lower classes, the father expends the dowry in the purchase of dress, ornaments, or furniture for the bride, which never become the property of her husband. Even when betrothed, the intercourse of the parties is very restricted. The Arabs will not allow them to see each other; but the Jews are not quite so stringent. The betrothals often continue for years before the man demands his wife; thus, "Samson went down and talked to the woman," or espoused her, and "after a time, he returned to take her."

AGE TO MARRY, IN EGYPT.

Girls are demanded at the age of ten, and between that and sixteen years; but after sixteen few men will seek them, and the dowry expected is then proportionably low. When a man demands his betrothed, a day is fixed for the nuptials, and for seven nights before he is expected to give a feast, which, however, is furnished by the guests themselves. Thus one sends coffee, another rice, another sugar, etc.

THE FEAST.

The principal time of this continued feast is the night before the consummation. The conduct is intrusted to the "friend of the bridegroom." (John iii. 29.) About the middle of this day the bride arrives at the house, and retires to the harem, where she sits with her mother, sisters, and female friends. At the third or fourth watch of the night—three or four hours after sunset—the bridegroom, who has not yet seen his fair one, goes to the mosque to pray, accompanied by "meshals," or torches and lanterns, with music. Upon his return he is introduced to his bride, with whom, having given her attendant a present to retire, he is left alone. He then throws off her veil, and for the first time sees her face. If satisfied, he informs the women outside, who immediately express their joy by screaming "Zuggareet," which is echoed by the women in the house, and then by those in the neighborhood.

COMPENSATION.

THE lovely violet smiles more saintly sweet
After the rain;
More golden shines after the summer's heat,
The waving grain.

And purer still, from out the furnace gloom,
Cometh the gold;
And brighter to the wanderer gleams his home
Through storm and cold.

How fair to watch the white ship seek the strand,
That left us in tears;
How thrilling is the clasping of the hand
After long years.

How dearly prized the love that stays to light
Our lonely way;
While others—false ones—faded as the night
Before the day.

And sweeter yet are the kisses, from lips
Unpressed for years;
And closing far the clasping of an arm
After grief and tears.

So looking back o'er the weary road
Our feet have press'd,
An hundred times more lovely seems at last
Eternal rest.

THE STORY OF A SAN FRANCISCO LOCKSMITH.

I AM a locksmith by trade. My calling is a strange one, and possesses a certain fascination rendering it one of the most agreeable of pursuits. Many who follow it see nothing in it but labor—think of nothing but its returns in gold and silver. To me it has other charms than the money it produces; consisting of occasional calls to open doors and peer into long neglected apartments; to spring the stubborn locks of safes and gloat upon the treasure piled within; to quietly enter the apartments of ladies with more beauty than discretion, and pick the locks of drawers containing peace destroying missives; evidences of wandering affections; to force the fastenings of cash boxes and depositories of records, telling of men made suddenly rich, of corporations plundered, of orphans robbed, of hopes crushed, of families ruined. Is there no charm in all this? no food for speculation? no scope for the range of active fancy? I am happy in being a locksmith, though my face may be begrimmed with the soot of the forge, and my hands stained with rust?

But I have a story to tell—not exactly a story either—for a story implies the completion as well as the beginning of a narrative—and mine is scarcely more than the introduction to one. Let him who deals in things of fancy write the rest. In the spring of 1856—I think it was in April—I opened a little shop on Kearny street, and soon worked myself into a fair business. Late one evening, a lady, closely veiled, entered my shop, and pulling from beneath her cloak a small japanned box, requested me to open it. The lock was curiously constructed, and I was all of an hour in fitting it with a key. The lady seemed nervous at the delay, and at length requested me to close the door. I was a little surprised at the suggestion, but of course complied. Shutting the door and returning to my work, the lady withdrew her veil, disclosing as sweet a face as can well be imagined. There was a restlessness in the eye, and a pallor in the cheek, however, which plainly told of a heart ill at ease, and in a moment every emotion for her had given place to that of pity.

"Perhaps you are not well, madam, and the night air is too chilly?" said I, rather inquisitively.

"Sir, in requesting you to close the door I had no other object than to escape the attention of persons."

I felt a rebuke in her reply, and did not answer but thoughtfully continued my work. She resumed:

"That little box contains valuable papers—private papers—and I have lost the key or it has been stolen. I should not wish to have you remember that I ever came here on such an errand," she continued with some hesitation, and giving me a look which it was no difficult matter to understand.

"Certainly, madam, if you desire it. If I cannot forget your face, I will at least attempt to lose the recollection of ever seeing it here."

The lady bowed rather coldly at what I considered a fine compliment, and I went on with my work, satisfied that no sudden discovered partiality for me had anything to do with the visit. Having succeeded, after much filing and cutting, in turning the lock, I was suddenly seized with a curiosity to get a glimpse at the precious contents of the box, and suddenly raising the lid, discovered a bundle of letters, and a daguerreotype, as I slowly passed the box to the owner. She seized it hurriedly, and placing the letters and picture in her pocket, locked the box, and drawing the veil over her face, pointed to the door. I opened it, and as she passed into the street she merely whispered,

"Remember!" and passed on towards the Plaza. In a few days the incident had entirely passed from my mind.

About two o'clock in the morning, in the latter part of May following, I was awoke by a gentle tap upon the window of the little room back of the shop, in which I lodged. Thinking of burglars, for they were frequent in those days, I sprang out of bed, and in a moment was at the window, with a heavy hammer in my hands which I usually kept at that time within convenient reach of my bedside.

"Who's there?" I inquired, raising the hammer, and peering out into the darkness—for it was as dark as Egypt when under the curse of Israel's God.

"Hist!" exclaimed a figure, stepping in front of the window, "open the door—I have business for you."

"Rather past business hours, I should say; but who are you?"

"No one that would harm you," replied the person in a soft whispering voice.

'Nor no one that can!" I replied rather emphatically, by way of warning, as I tightened my grip upon the hammer, and proceeded to the door. I pushed back the bolt and slowly opened the door, discovered the stranger already upon the steps.

"What do you want?" I abruptly inquired.

"I will tell you," answered the same soft voice, "if you dare open the door wide enough for me enter."

"Come in," said I resolutely, throwing the door ajar, and proceeding to light a candle. Having succeeded, I turned to examine the visitor. He was a small and neatly dressed gentleman, with a heavy Raglan around his shoulders, and a blue navy cap drawn suspiciously over the eyes. As I advanced toward him he seemed to hesitate a moment, then raised the cap from his forehead, and looked me curiously in the face. I did not drop the candle, but I acknowledge to a little nervousness as I hurriedly placed the light upon the table and silently proceeded to invest myself with two or three very necessary articles of clothing. As the Lord liveth, my visitor was a lady, and the same one for whom I had opened the little box about a month before! Having completed my hasty toilet I attempted to stammer an apology for my rudeness, but utterly failed. The fact is, I was confounded.

Smiling at my discomfiture, she said:

'Disguise is useless; I presume you recognize me?'

'I believe I told you, madam, I should not soon forget your face. In what way can I serve you?'

'By doing half an hour's work before daylight to morrow and receiving five hundred dollars for your labor,' was the reply.

It is not ordinary work,' said I, inquiringly, 'that commands so liberal a compensation.'

'It is a labor common to your calling,' returned the lady. 'The price is not so much for the labor, as the condition under which it must be performed.'

'And what is the condition?' I inquired.

'That you will submit to being conveyed from and returned to your own door blindfolded.'

Ideas of murder, burglary, and almost every other crime to villainy, hurriedly presented themselves in succession as I politely bowed, and said:

'I must understand something more of the character of the employment, as well as the conditions, to accept your offer.'

'Will not five hundred dollars answer in lieu of an explanation?' she inquired.

'No—nor five thousand!'

She patted her foot nervously on the floor. I could see she had placed entirely too low an estimate on my honesty, and I felt some gratification in being able to convince her of the fact.

'Well, then, if it is absolutely necessary for me to explain,' she replied, 'I must tell you that you are required to pick the lock of a fire-proof vault, and—'

'You have gone quite far enough, madam, with your explanation,' I interrupted; 'I am at your service.'

'As I said,' she continued, 'you are required to pick the lock of a vault, and rescue from death a man who has been confined there for three days.'

'To whom does the vault belong, I inquired.

'My husband,' was the somewhat reluctant reply.

'Then why so much secrecy? or rather how came a man confined in such a place?'

'I secreted him there, to escape the observation of my husband. He suspected as much and closed the door upon him. Presuming he had left the vault and quitted the house by the back door, I did not dream until to-day that he was confined there. I know he is there! Certain suspicious acts of my husband this afternoon, convince me that he is there, beyond human hearing, and will be starved to death by my brutal husband unless immediately rescued. For three days my husband has not left the house. I drugged him less than an hour ago, and he is now so completely stupefied that the lock may be picked without his interference. I have searched his pockets, but cannot find the key. You must rescue him. Now that you know all, will you accompany me?'

'To the end of the world, madam, on such an errand.'

Then prepare yourself, quick! there is a cab at the door.'

I was a little surprised, for I had not heard the sound of wheels. Hastily drawing on a coat, and providing myself with the required implements, I was soon at the door. There sure enough was the cab with the driver in his seat, ready for the mysterious journey. I entered the vehicle, followed by the lady. As soon as I was seated she produced a heavy handkerchief, which, by the faint light of an adjacent street lamp, she carefully bound round my eyes. The lady seated herself beside me and the cab started. I could feel her trembling. In half an hour the vehicle stopped—in what part of the city I am entirely ignorant, and it was evidently driven in anything but a direct course from the point of starting.

Examining the bandage to see that my vision was completely obscured, the lady handed me my bundle of tools with which I was provided, then taking me by the arm, led me through a gate into a house which I knew was of brick, and after taking me along a passage way, which could not have been less than fifty feet in length, and down a flight of stairs into what was evidently an underground basement, stopped beside a vault, and removed the handkerchief from my eyes.

"Here is the vault—open it," she whispered, opening the door of a dark lantern, and letting a beam of light upon the lock.

I took a bunch of skeleton keys, and, after a few trials, which the lady seemed to watch with the most painful anxiety, sprang the bolt. The door swung upon its hinges and my companion whispering me not to close it, as it was self-locking, sprang into the vault.

I could see it was one of those large iron vaults, that were formerly so frequently constructed to protect valuables from the destructive and terrible conflagrations that devasted the city in its earlier days. I did not follow. I heard the murmur of low voices within, the next moment the lady re-appeared, and leaning upon her arm a man with face so pale and haggard that I started at the sight. I would know him again amongst a thousand. How he must have suffered, during the three long days of his confinement in the vault!

"Remain here," she said, handing me the lantern, "I will be back in a moment."

The two slowly ascended the stairs, and I heard them enter a room immediately above where I was standing. In less than a minute the lady returned.

"Shall I close it, madam," said I, placing my hand upon the door of the vault.

"No! no!" she exclaimed hastily seizing my arm; "it awaits another occupant!"

"Madam, you certainly do not intend to—"

"Are you ready?" she interrupted, impatiently, holding the handkerchief before my eyes. "Here is your money."

The thought flashed across my mind that she intended to push me into the vault, and bury me and my secret together. She seemed to read the suspicion, and continued—

"Do not be alarmed. You are not the man!"

I could not mistake the truth or the fearful meaning of the remark, and I shuddered as I bent my head to the handkerchief. My eyes were as carefully bandaged as before; I was led to the cab, and the purse of money placed beside me, and then was driven home by a more circuitious route, if possible than the one which we came. Arriving in front of the house the handkerchief was removed and I stepped from the vehicle with my purse, and in a moment the cab and its mysterious occupant had turned the corner and was out of sight.

I entered the shop, and the purse of gold, which counted out even five hundred dollars, was the only evidence I could summon in my bewilderment, that all I had just witnessed was not a dream.

A month after I saw the gentleman taken from the vault, leisurely walking along the street with the lady on his arm. I do not know, but I believe the sleeping husband awoke within the vault, and his bones are there to day! They still reside in San Francisco, and I frequently see them promenading Montgomery street.

Proverbial Wisdom.

Your breath you'll not sweeten by talking of honey;
Self-wise ones are soonest beguiled of their money;
Foolish friends, more than foes, are the vials of sorrow;
Not long will they ride who their horses must borrow;
You'd better a friend than a kinsman rely on;
Though a gnat is your foe, think him strong as a lion;
A hand may be white that is washed upon credit;
A word may be true, though a jester hath said it.

The Great Duty of the World.—Of all the causes which are operating and can operate to the bringing about of the perfection of the human race, the first place is assigned to the education of the young, a thorough and wise education, not an education after the manner of the schools solely, but an education that shall make strong and apt for all the encounter and service of the world in which we live and move. That the young be taught and trained—all the young, not one being neglected—is constantly enforced as the great duty and the wisdom of society, this being the surest hope of continual and rapid advance.

Russell, of the London Times, says that in the Austrian army the big drums are drawn on carts, by dogs. "The drum is put on a sort of go-cart, with shafts and a pair of wheels, and as Pompey trots along the drummer beats the sheepskin."

POPULAR JOURNALISM.

NOTWITHSTANDING the great diversity of tastes, few will be inclined to deny that there is such a thing as a standard of taste, so far as objects within the domain of art are concerned, and that that standard is not to be found in the decision of the majority.

A popular vote, no qualification for suffrage being required, would scarcely be considered a satisfactory method of deciding the relative excellence of two rival master-pieces; and it seems a not unreasonable proposition that some special attention to the particular art in question, and some education of the taste, in reference to it, are necessary to make one a connoisseur in painting, or music, or literature. Indeed, what is this, more than simply applying in the domain of taste, the truism that knowledge of a subject is necessary to correct judgment in regard to it? Everywhere except in matters of art and literature, this is practically admitted. For instance, however ready we may all be to "express an opinion," and to stand by it stoutly if controverted, concerning the merits of a horse or a brand of wine, most sensible persons who are not themselves experts, would be inclined to give great weight to the decision of the jockeys or the tasters when it came to the practical question of betting or buying. When the matter assumes this shape, even the most opinionated and self-satisfied individuals of that pragmatical class that settles all questions of taste with a stnrdy "I know what I like at any rate," become docile. Men who do not hesitate to criticise the decisions of courts, to confute the lawyers, and to argue questions of therapeutics with a physician, are as ready as their neighbors to defer to professional authority the moment personal interests become seriously involved, as in the case of a questionable land title or a dangerous fever.

Of course no element of taste can enter into the decision of legal or medical questions; here, it is knowledge and conversance with the subject that are deferred to; all that those who deny that questions in art can be determined by the popular verdict, would be disposed to insist upon, is that an element of knowledge also enters into the decision of those questions, though mingled with another and subtler element, and that special culture and study should carry with them something of the same authority, though less absolute, that is accorded them in science and the mechanical arts.

Though mere popularity is no more infallible as a criterion of intrinsic excellence, in literature than it is in art, yet it is noteworthy that here, there is generally less disagreement between the popular taste and that of the critical and cultivated minority. As a rule, the best books, that is in general literature, enjoy a reasonable share of popularity. Yet where poetry or fiction of the highest order attains the widest popularity, it will generally be found that the critics have one ground of admiration, and the people another. Thus, it is probable that the universal appreciation of Shakspeare is much more due to the quotable passages in which he abounds, and that have been collected into miscellanies, school-books, "beauties of Shakspeare," etc, than to those more important elements which constitute his true greatness. And it has sometimes happened that a work of great merit has been popular on account of its faults. Hence the judgment of the uncritical may be correct so far as the result is concerned, though erroneous in the grounds of its conclusion. Here, too, the instinct that prevents men from too readily surrendering opinions which they are unable to defend successfully by argument, finds its justification. It is much easier to arrive at sound conclusions than to render sound reasons for them. If men were invariably to renounce their convictions when they were out argued or out-talked, they would be at the mercy of every adroit and voluble sophist. There is a certain honest obstinacy in adhering to opinions that seem to have been triumphantly confuted, which is not always as stupid as it appears.

Nowhere, perhaps, in any department of art or literature, is the common judgment more generally sound and reliable, than in its estimate of current journalism. Almost invariably the popular taste coincides with that of the critical and cultivated class, as to what constitutes a good journal. Of course there are exceptions, but as a general thing it will be found that the best papers are the most influential and the most widely read. There is little actual ground for the notion that a journal may be made "too good to be appreciated." It may be made too narrow in its range, too one sided, too exclusively devoted to a hobby, but scarcely too good. To the unreflecting, it is a matter of surprise to observe how thoroughly the higher order of journalism is appreciated by the comparatively uncultivated masses. Prestige, and respect for an established reputation, and a degree of unconscious deference to the opinions of the better informed, probably have something to do with this, but they fail to furnish a complete and satisfactory explanation. The preference of the average Englishman for the Times, and of the average American for those journals that are conducted with ability and dignity cannot be a mere fashion. Prestige doubtless has its weight, but it cannot induce any considerable portion of the population of a country to continue to read what they do not really like. All the prestige of Milton has failed to make him popular while in spite of the derision of the critics, and the mingled amazement and disgust of the cultivated, Martin Farquhar Tupper has ten times as many readers as Browning, and twice as many as Tennyson. It is true that a parallel to this may be found in journalism, if we compare the popularity of such publications as Bonner's Ledger or the London Journal, with that of the best New York and London weeklies, but besides that our compliment to the popular taste had especial reference to daily journalism, it may be suggested that the papers named differ not merely in their literary merit, but also in the kind of literature they dispense, and it is not to be expected that essays and criticism will be found as popular with the mass of readers as sensational stories. If the question were between clever sensational stories and stupid ones, or between able essays and feeble ones, the case would be more in point.

So far as substantial ability in journalism is concerned, the popular taste, both in England and America, is wonderfully appreciative; it is in regard to form and style that it is most wanting in discrimination. It is still too partial to the declamatory vein, and unduly liable to mistake crude energy of expression, and the exaggeration and hyperboles of passion for genuine force. To the mass of readers, the discussion of a political measure, or of a question of foreign policy in the finished and thoroughly metropolitan style peculiar to the London Saturday Review, would probably seem less able than if treated in the more rhetorical vein of the Times. It is also undoubtedly true that in the United States, the communities in which a certain declamatory energy is the most admired element in journalism are more numerous than those where higher qualities would be properly estimated.

But it is gratifying to note that in nearly all the great cities of the country the standard of popular taste is already so far elevated that the most influential journals are those most eminently characterized by good sense, well-considered views, fullness of information, fairness, and sterling ability, and that it is only in the backwoods and among provincial communities that the ultra extravagant type of stump speech is the approved model for a powerful leader, or a natural turn for quaint vituperation is sufficient to secure a reputation as a "forcible writer."

REJECTED CONTRIBUTIONS.

YOUNG or inexperienced writers should not infer from the fact that their contributions are declined by any literary paper worthy of the name in its higher sense, that such contributions are considered destitute of merit. Not a week passes during which we do not find it necessary to pass adversely upon articles or poems sent us for publication, which give evidence of unmistakable talent, and even of crude and undeveloped genius. But "form" is an important element in literature, and the power of clothing the writer's conception in ripe, symmetrical, artistic form, is one that is seldom acquired without much effort and repeated failures. No writer, who possesses genuine aspiration and disinterested love of literary production, should feel discouraged because his first attempts are not accepted by the higher class of periodicals. Besides, he should consider that an editor's judgment is not infallible; it is liable to be influenced and swayed by a thousand disturbing causes dependent upon mood and surrounding circumstances. Even the best and most discriminating editor, in the press of his daily duties, sometimes tosses a clever contribution into the waste-paper basket and places a decidedly inferior one upon file for publication.

THE Ellsworth Rifles will hold their Fifth Anniversary Invitation Party, on Monday evening next, at Union Hall. We acknowledge a card of invitation.

AMUSEMENTS.

AT Maguire's Opera House, the attendance has been excellent throughout the week; and on the Fanchon nights—Wednesday and Friday—the house was jammed, the ladies pre-empting nearly all the seats in the parquette as well as in the boxes. That people should be anxious to repeatedly see this play is not surprising; for, aside from its merits, it is produced and cast in an almost perfect manner. The "Fanchon" of Miss Kingsbury is about as good and as pure a piece of heart-moving acting as can be conceived. Full of sensibility and emotion, she presents us with nearly a perfect representation and embodiment of the character. Mr. McCullough, too, as "Landry Barbeaud," gives us a quiet impersonation, full of excellence and responsive feeling, and one that has gained him much credit and merited commendation. Barry, Mrs. Jackson, Mrs. Judah, and all the support, are most clever in their parts, and serve to make the Cricket a happy success in all its details.

Satan in Paris was placed on the stage on Thursday night, with Miss Kingsbury in the protean part of "Satan." The piece is a French translation of considerable merit, originally produced in the United States some twenty years ago, at Mitchell's Olympic, New York, with Mary Taylor in the same character, strongly supported by Miss Clark, Walcot, Holland, Nickerson, and others, where it had a great run. Miss Kingsbury acted the leading character with marked ability, ably sustained by Mr. McCullough; but the success of the piece was somewhat marred by imperfections in study and erratic departures from the text by some of the other characters. Where first impressions are so notably potent for good or evil, as in San Francisco, interest alone should dictate a more careful production of a good play, like this, containing a half-dozen characters with point and pith in them.

For this afternoon's entertainment, The Hidden Hand will be repeated; and this evening will introduce us to the Lady of Kildare, though we have not the remotest idea what manner of lady she will be. The bewitching little Cricket will again chirp for the public on Monday night.

THE HOWSON TROUPE open at the Metropolitan for a short season, on Monday night, with Cinderella. The Sisters are young, talented and attractive, and the balance of the troupe possess ability above the average standard of English opera troupes. They deserve success even if they should not win it. They propose to vary the programme by producing musical extravaganzas to alternate with the operas.

THE RAVEL-MARTINETTI TROUPE are now on the seas on their way to San Francisco to fill a winter engagement with Managers Birrell & Co. of the Metropolitan Theatre of this city. The troupe consists of twenty persons in all, and have a repertoire of over fifty pieces. They bring with them an immense amount of stage paraphernalia and trick machinery, and will doubtless present to our citizens a novel and attractive season.

BENEFITS.—A lack of space prevents our noticing in detail the benefits of Master Smith, the Howson sisters, Signor Morley, and Mons. Roncovieri, that all came off during the week. We have only room to say that they were creditable performances in a musical point of view and actual "benefits," indeed, in the happy returns of golden notes to the beneficiaries.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS.—The beautiful and varied attractions at these gardens draw many visitors daily. Paintings, statuary, beautiful walks, flowers, curious beasts and birds add to the natural charmes of the garden, and make this a most desirable place of resort to while away a pleasant autumn afternoon.

OPPOSITION.—The facilities of ocean travel to New York via Nicaragua are about to be greatly increased. The Company generally known as the Nicaragua Steamship Line have determined to run a semi-monthly line of new steamers on that route, and have greatly increased their capital and reorganized under the title of North American Steamship Company, with that purpose in view. They have just purchased three new steamships at the East, one of which, the San Francisco, a fine new steamer of 2,500 tons, will make the connection at Greytown with the Moses Taylor, which is to leave here on the 15th of November. For the present a steamer will be dispatched every twenty days; but it is the intention of the Company to put on a semi-monthly line as soon as one of the new steamers, now preparing for immediate dispatch in New York, can reach this port. In the meantime many improvements will be made by dredging operations and otherwise at Greytown.

Should have been Stopped.

In the list of passengers on the America, we noticed "Rev. J. D. Strong, wife and 7 children." The Reverend J. D. Strong ought to be ashamed of himself. What right has he to take seven children out of this State, even if they do belong to him? Some means should be taken to prevent people from taking children out of the State in this wholesale manner.

Mrs. Woxcackle on Church Matters.

MR. EDDYTER:—Grashus knows I'm glad enuff to see Mr. Woxcackle taking an intyrist in church matters wich I never expected he would care no more for, nor half as much for that matter, as his cigar after dinner, or his noospaper at breakfast. And so it took me all aback, like a lectric shock, to see him all nt once getting as excited as ever you see a man, about Mr. Eagan and St. James', wich he says all Front street is on bis side, meuning Mr. Eagan's, and against tbe Bishop, and will back him, meaning Mr. Eagau and tbe Free Church, for sums untold, to keep it up. And he says be don't miud coming down for a cool thousand or so if wanted, and is opposed to ekklcsyastikal tyranny und persekutiou, and that the other ministers is jellus, becaws Mr. Eagan is smarter tban them, and the Bishop, too, is jellus becaws he don't waut no bright men and popnler men in the dyoceese, wich is ridiklus, and I am sbure never thort of by tbe Bishop, wich is above such meanness; and he says tbat he means that Mr. Eugau shall be sustayned, wich he says is the determinashun of plenty more on Front street tbat can jest buy and sell all the todies and time servers, wich I don't know wbat it means. Never hev I seen Mr. Woxcackle so sturd up about enny nortal thing, unless it was bisyness or stocks or sumthing of tbat sort, and be vows he'll give up our pew in Grace, and attend St James', wich I bope he don't mean, for after getting into sosyity by atteuding Grace and subscribing for tbe debt, and sich, it would be a great come-down to go to a Free Church wich in reason is meant for such as can't pay their way, nnd not for rich peeple wich can afford to move in the best cirkles, wich, tbank Heaven, we bave done ever since Mr. Woxcackle got out of the retale bizness and took a $400 pew in Grace. But there's some consolashun in what Mrs. Van Slamm says, wich is that St. James' is not free in that way. and will be as expensiv nnd fasbernable as enny other, and as aristokratik, wich tbere may be sumthing in, seeing the Queen (though dark-complekted) attendid the Fair.

Speeking of wich, the Fair I mean, tbe conduckt of Mr B——, who eskorted the Queen, giv much offens to sum; for he jest prommynadid ber nround the Hall as if be wanted to monopylize her all to himself, or was iguerant of ettyket and didn't know how it was proper to act, not bein' accustomed to royal sosyety; and he didn't even intrerdoose her to the lady Preserdiut, nor to but one of the ladys tbat kep tbe tables, and her be couldn't help himself from intrerdoosing, sbe follered him up so persisteut. But I do hope Mr. W—— will get over his excitement and cool down, and not go to tbe Free Church; tho' he is a hedstrong man when he gets a noshun, aud not easy managed. Yours respectfully, MARIA WOXCACKLE.

P. S.—Well, I've reely been to the Conventercle on Natomy street, much as our clergyman objects to such meetings, and I'm glad I went eveu if I should be suspendid for it, for it was as good as enny play, and with tbe excepshun tbat it ain't at all fasheruable—(scch bon nits!)—and that the minister (wich our clergyman says is no minister at all) tells such humerus stories and makes the congregashun laugb, wich, tho' perhaps sootable in dissentiu' meetiu's, seems strange at first, exceptin' wicb drawbacks, it seems respecterble enuff. And goodness knows it's the last thing I should ever thort of, and it was no doins of mine, but Sunday mornin' jest as I was getting reddy for Church, who should come bouncin' in but Mrs. Van Slamm, and, "Maria," she says: "I've heard so much of their goius on at the meetin round on Natomy street, that I've made up my mind to see the show for myself, and I'm bound to go it' it's the death of me, so," says she, "you jest hurry on your things and come right along." And she's got such a rushing way with her, tbat woman has, for all the worla jest like a high wind a blowin', tbat resistin' her when she takes a notion in her head is one of the impossecbles. And so, Mr. Woxcackle having gone out to Seel Rock with a customer from Red Bluffs, wich tbere was no use of me objectin' to on accouut of it's being Sunday, I thort I might have my amusement too, and went according. As to the preechin' I wood try to give you an idea of it, wich, however, Mrs. Van Slamm said she would do herself, as she see no reeson wby she shoodn't be a litterary corresponding for tbe papers herself, wich if she stays in the noshun she will do; and it needn't surprize you to receave a communycashun from ber on the subjick. M. W.

Mrs. Van Slamm Goes to Meeting.

MR. EDITOR: Them that go in for intoning, aud singing boys, and dressing up clergymen like Italian robbers in a play, and all that sort of fol-de-rol, may talk as much as tbey please in their sneerin' way about "Prispyterian conventicles" and "Methodist prayer-meetings;" but they'll have to talk themselves blind before they'll ever convince me that their sort of religious circus is any better than the other kiud. I've heard say, too much water will stop a mill jest as certain as too little; aud to my mind, too much form and ceremony will smother the spirituality of religion jest as quick as too little will starve it. There's no use of our clergyman telling me it's wicked to attend meeting. I wasn't born yesterday, and I guess tbe time's gone by when ministers could dictate to people about their private affairs; I hope I've got common sense, but if I haint it's too late to be helped now, and I'll have to chance it. So I told Mr. —— that, wicked or not wicked, I was going to attend one of those meetings. I'd seen the Puseyito show, with the nice little boys in their nice little white stoles and the rest of it, and now I meant to see the evangelical performance, with the gettin' up to be prayed for and tbe tellin' experiences, and all that. As to the necessity of being in "the Church," I told him I hoped that the congregation at Dashaway Hall, nor yet the Natoma street one, hadn't a monopoly of salvation. It does seem so strange to me that most religious people, ministers specially, are so set on making every one be religious exactly accordiug to their own particnlar little pattern, and make more fuss over the pattern than the cloth.

Well, so I went; and though its a different sort of thing entirely from St. James, yet there's a kind of people, no doubt, it agrees with; and if it suits their religions appetite and does 'em good, where's the harm? The sermon was an oddity in the way of a scrmon, and it did make the people giggle a little once or twice, which shocked Mrs. Woxcackle, who was with me. It wasn't tbe kind of sermou I've been used to, but the congregation seemed to like it. It was all about Elijah, how he went to sleep, "and snored, snored very loud," and the angel came and made a fire aud baked a cake. "Yes," says the minister, for all the world as if he had been there and beard Elijah snore, and saw the angel doing his baking, and had a taste of the cake himself,—"Yes, a better cake than auy of you women could bake." And then, Elijah got kind of woke up and turned over, without even so much as tbanking the angel, and then he went to sleep again. "Now," says he, "if one of you'd been treated so, you'd a given Elijah a good kick, aud said 'can't you tbauk a feller?'" As near as I could make out, the lesson of the day was, to 'keep wide awake' und 'forgive your enemies,' and always to remember your manners when you have anytbing to do with angels, und to say "thank you sir," wheu they do you a good turn. The preacher concluded by telling the congregation to go every one of them to Union Hall in the evening, to bear Mr. Earle, tbe Evangelist. So, I tbought since I'd made a beginning of religious sight-seeing, I might as well finish up tbe husiuess, as I might never have another chunce to see a live "Evangelist," who has come tbree thousand miles, more or less, to "carry tbe Lord" to this benighted land. They do say I haven't a mite of reverence in my composition, nor a sign of such a bump on my bead, but if tbere's any irreverence about that, it's the "Evangelist's," not mine, and if there was a short-hand writer there to take down the words, he'll bear me out. We must make haste, be told us, if we wanted "to find tbe Lord," for he'd got to go pretty soon (the Evangelist had) to "carry the Lord" to the people in other parts of the land, which sounded as if he thougbt there was uo chance for poor sinful critters after he had left. Then he wanted all those that were anxious to be saved to stand up, and everybody stood up, wbich seemed to disappoint him, as if he was surprised that so many sbould want to go to Heaven, and he set 'em down again, aud asked only them that were very anxious, to get up.

If I thought that this standing up, and getting prayed for, and going to the anxious seat, would get me to Heaven, I'd go into it with all my migbt, it's so much easier, and quicker too, than the slow-going old-fashioned way of trying to lead a "sober, righteous, aud Godly life, and keeping up the fight against your old Adam as long as the breath's in your body. Well, after all, we're poor, prejudiced, obstinate critters, and I guess there isn't much to choose between us in tbe long run. We've all got our notions, and are apt to be set in our way, and think there's none right but our own. So far as I see, all these different kinds of religion seem to suit some kind of people or other. Exhorting and telliug experiences agrees with some, and intouing and little boys rigged up like an organ-grinder's monkey agrees with others, and if any one considers me a beatben because neither of 'em suits my constitutioa, why they're welcome to.

MARY ANN VAN SLAMM.

Louis Napoleon's Daughter.

"Spiridiou," the Paris correspondent of the Boston Gazette, tells a very roumntic story about the marriage and approaching divorce of M'lle Laure de Wilna, the daughter of Louis Napoleon and Mrs. Howard. Count de Tolna, chamberlain of the Emperor of Austria, at the age of forty-two thought it was time to marry. He determined if possible to marry a "virtuous young orphan," and meeting M'lle Laure de Wilna, thought she was just the sort of young party he was looking for. He wrote a letter asking if her health was good, and if she could bear tobacco smoke. He also set forth his virtues Laure wrote him a letter saying that he was just the sort of husband she wanted; she did not object to tobacco; in fact, she says: "You smoke? well, we will smoke as may he agreeable to you." On the 30th of July they were married. On tbe 12th of August the Count wrote from Baden to Mme. Godefroy, who had acted as "mother" to Laure:

"Her indifference gives me pain. She will not thou me and refuses to allow me to share her bed. Sbe covers ber face with tallow just as she goes to bed. I cannot tell you what ner object is; it prevents me from kissing her. The truth is, moreover, the moment Laure touches bed she goes fast asleep without giviug a thougbt to God or her husband."

This was, indeed, a terrible state of things. We cannot believe that Laure suffered from a chronic cold in her head which rendered it necessary for her to tallow her nose. The Count de Tolna was evidently a much abused man. Who could tolerate a wife who smeared her face with tallow? What pathos there is in the simple complaint: "It prevents me from kissing her!" On the 18th August he writes:

"Laure really is unbearable. She gives me pain every way. Yesterday, before a large company, she refused to take my arm, and before dinner she hung on Mons. Gouteman's arm from Lichtental to tbe hotel. Mme. G—— reproached her lightly for it. She replied sbe wanted to be divorced from me, and would slap my face."

Tbe end of the matter is, tbat Laure bas sued for a divorce, and unless her Imperial papa interferes authoritatively, will probably get it. This is very sad. We fear that there are San Francisco husbands who are treated as badly by tbeir wives as was poor Count de Tolna!

Grateful Teetotalists.

At the last meeting of the Temperance Legion, of whose proceedings we gave such a first-rate notice last week, the following preamble and resolution were passed:

"WHEREAS, some remarks were made by some members of the Temperance State Convention, on the floor of that body lately in session, casting reflections upon tbe Press of our city in regard to their illiberality in noticing the Temperance movement, which does some of them injustice, and placing the Temperance Legion (who were represented in that body) in an unfavorable light; therefore,

Resolved, That the Press have never refused to publish notices of tbe meetings of the Legion, or other matter, when handed to them (in season) by the officers of this association; that it would have been highly pleasing to us if the Press in general had taken more notice of the Temperance movement in this city particularly, but the editors are supposed to be men who understand their own business, and we do therefore consider ourselves under obligations to those papers who have published the notice of our meetings every week, and more particularly so to those who have reported and published the proceedings of our meetings from week to week, or occasionally, with appropriate remarks; to all of which we would say, that they have cast their bread upon the waters, and it shall return to them in due season with increased dimensions, according to tbe quantity cast forth; and as a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump, we hope before long to witness the entire Press of this city casting their bread upon tbe waters in the same direction, with a bountiful hand."

All right. We've been casting our bread upon the waters, and it will return to us swollen in dimensions. What a glorious spectucle will be presented by "the entire Press of this city casting their bread upon the waters in the same direction, with a bountiful hand." When we consider that tbe above preamble and resolution were written by a man who drinks nothing but cold water, we are shocked that any editor who nnderstands his business should deem it necessary to stimulate his brain with intoxicatiug fluids. We hope, indeed, as a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump, and a word to the wise is sufficient for them, and there is no such word as fail, tbat all the editors will immediately begin to cast their bread upon the waters in the same direction, with a bountiful hand, and will spill gallons of ink in praise of cold water as a beverage.

Swill Butter.

The Bulletin claims that it has saved the lives of sixteen hundred and seventy infants—more or less—by its crusade against swill-milk. No doubt since the Bulletin has turned its attention to tbe subject of swill milk, fewer drunken babies have been observed reeling in a state of disgraceful intoxication in their mothers' arms. Moreover, fewer udvertisements have appeared in the columns of the Bulletin and other daily papers, offering rewards for tbe recovery of cows which bave strayed from their owners, in consequence of having be come horribly drunk on distillery swill. Nevertheless, and notwithstanding this, we claim tbat the Bulletin has not gone far enough. Is the Bulletin retained as tbe advocate of tbe rights of babies alone? Are not the lives of human beings who bave passed through tbe perils of teething, the measles, and other ills incideut to babyhood, of more consequence than lives so young? Supposing tbat one, two, three—nay, three-score babies, become drunk, or even die from the effects of swill-milk, of what consequence is that compared with the effect of swill-milk butter on full-grown men?

Johnson—tbe Johnson whose name is with motbers a synonym for Herod—does not sell swill milk now—he makes butter of it. It has been definitively settled by Dr. Rowell and other learned men, tbat swill-milk will make babies drunk. What will swill butter do? Just think of it! How many a man has, on returning home after a hard day's work, been accused, by his wife, of being intoxicuted, when perhaps he has simply eaten a slice of breud and butter for lunch, and the swill butter has got into his head? This is terrible. Babies are irresponsible beings, but meu are held accountable. Who dare say that half the cases of delirium tremens which bave occurred in this city have not been superinduced by the habit of eating bread on which was spread butter, made from the milk of intoxicated and dissolute cows? Tbe subject of swill cheese we reserve for a future article. We will only say tbat we believe that many a man has been accused of becoming intoxicated at lunch-time ou six glasses of whisky, when perhaps swill cheese was solely to blame.

Rare Coins.

We have received the first two numbers of the American Journal of Numismatics. We are glad tbat Numismatic Societies have been formed in the Eastern States. At a late meeting of one of these Societies a number of rare coins were exhibited, consisting of half dollars, quarter dollars, and even a real twenty-dollar piece. The American Journal of Numismatics says in its introductory article:

"The collection of coins has not only become an infatuating and engrossing pursuit among thousands of persons of all ages and either sex, but out of it has grown up an extensive trade, furnishing the means of livelihood to numerous individuals in all our large cities. Prices have risen an hundred fold, and in some cases almost incalculably and unreasonably; speculation has been rife; in many cases, we regret to say, dishonesty has exhibited itself in its most glaring and disgusting form."

It then sets forth the necessity for the publicatinn of a Numismatic Journal. By all accounts coin is not so plentiful in tbe Eastern States that the habit of hoarding up old quarters and dimes ought to be encouraged. Tbe numismatical study which most interests people at present is to devise some means of getting rid of postage stamps aud bringing gold and silver again into circulation.

Melancholy Business.

The proprietors of the Lone Mountain Cemetery have a great many vacant lots which they are anxious to dispose of at an exorbitant price. At present the health of San Francisco is alarmingly good, and the report of the business for tbo past few months will be anything but a cheerful one to the stockholders.

In Paris the undertaker's business is a monopoly, and is farmed by the city to a joint stock company. It is said the last annual report of the manager to the shareholders of this company commenced: "Gentlemen, tbe year opened badly, tbe general bealtb of tbe public was unfortunately excellent; a change for tbe better took place in September; we are happy to say tbe cbolera made its appeurance in Paris and proved fatal in the majority of cases."

The stockholders in the Lone Mountain Cemetery cannot now hope for a visitation of the cholera to cheer them, and the sale of swill-milk having been put a stop to, their business prospects are decidedly melancholy

Ristori's Teeth.

The New York Bourdoir is very severe on the enterprising tradespeople of New York. It says:

"We bave a fine example of the delicate taste and sweet generosity inherent among tbe "American people" in the fact that within forty-eight hours after Ristori had landed on our shores, she had sent to her as presents twenty boxes containing materials for cleaning her teeth!"

What can be more natural, after all, than the wish to present a distinguished foreigner with samples of the industry of the country. There may be, however, some danger of Ristori's writing when she returns to Paris and publishes an account of the products of America, and the manners and customs of the inhabitants: "The chief product of the country is tooth powder, which is presented in large quantities to foreigners immediately after their arrival."

A Compliment to Dr. Rowell.

Eben Johnson and other dairymen who are in the habit of feeding their cows on distillery refuse have employed Dr. Price to make an analysis of tbe milk produced by cows thus fed, and the result of his investigations is published in yesterday's Bulletin, occupying about two columns and a half of the advertising space of that public spirited journal. Dr. Price says in section four of his report: "Selection of Cow."—"I selected a cow known as Rowell; is four years of age and in good health." All must admire Eben Johnson for paying the eminent lecturer on milk the compliment of numing his cow after him. Rowell, it appears, is a good sober sort of an animal, and never gets drunk now, and was pronounced to have suffered no injury from the diet proscribed by Eben Johnson.

MAYER'S BAZAAR is one of the features of San Francisco. Here can be found the greatest variety of watches, jewelry, silver-plated ware, guitars, music-boxes, concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, and articles of bijouterie for presents or mementos for both ladies and gentlemen. Here, too, you can purchase at prices that defy competition. The present stock must be reduced, and the proprietors are determined to sell so low that the prices asked cannot be objected to. Those heavy cased silver watches from the American Watch company, so celebrated for their correct time and superior workmanship, can be bought at Mayer's Bazaar at the company's prices. Superior French opera-glasses of great magnifying power for sale or hire Family clocks, musical instruments, and every description of fancy goods at reduced rates at MAYER'S BAZAAR, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

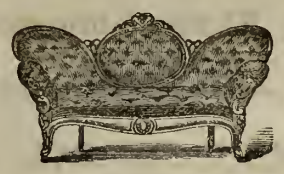
HOW BYRON PREVENTED FATNESS.

BYRON had not damaged his body by strong drinks, but his terror of getting fat was so great that he reduced his diet to the point of starvation. He was of that soft lymphatic temperament, which is almost impossible to keep within a moderate compass, particularly as, in his case, his lameness prevented his taking exercise. When he added to his weight, even standing was painful; so he resolved to keep down to eleven stone, or shoot himself. He said everything he swallowed was instantly converted into tallow, and deposited on his ribs. He was the only human being I ever met with who had sufficient self-restraint and resolution to resist this proneness to fatten. He did so; and at Genoa, where he was last weighed, he was ten stone and nine pounds (one hundred and forty-nine pounds,) and looking much less. This was not from vanity about his personal appearance, but from a better motive; and as, like "Justice Greedy," he was always hungry, his merit was the greater. Occasionally he relaxed his vigilance, when he swelled apace. I remember one of his old friends saying, "Byron, how well you are looking." If he had stopped there it had been well; but when he added, "you are getting fat," Byron's brow reddened, and his eyes flashed. "Do you call getting fat looking well, as if I were a hog?" and turning to me he muttered "The beast! I can hardly keep my hands off him!"

The man who thus offended him was the husband of the lady addressed as "Genevra," and the original of his "Zuleika," in the "Bride of Abydos." I don't think he had much appetite for his dinner that day, or for many days, and never forgave the man, who, so far from wishing to offend, intended to pay him a compliment. Byron said he tried all sorts of experiments to stay his hunger without adding to his bulk. "I swelled," he said, "at one time, to fourteen stone (one hundred and ninety-six pounds,) so I clapped the muzzle on my jaws, and, like the hybernating animals, consumed my own fat." He would exist on biscuits and soda water for days together; then to allay the eternal hunger gnawing at his vitals, he would make up a horrid mess of cold potatoes, rice, fish, or greens, deluged in vinegar, and gobble it up like a famished dog. On either of these unsavory dishes, with a biscuit and a glass or two of Rhine wine,—he cared not how sour,—he called feasting sumptuously.

Upon my observing he might as well have fresh fish or vegetables, instead of stale, he laughed, and answered, "I have an advantage over you; I have no palate. One thing is as good as another to me."

"Nothing," I said, "disagrees with the natural man. He fasts and gorges; his brains don't bother him; but if you wish to live"—



"Who wants to live?" he interrupted. "Not I. The Byrons are a short-lived race on both sides, father and mother. Longevity is hereditary. I am nearly at the end of my tether. I don't care for death a damn; it is her sting I can't bear pain."

By starving his body, Byron kept his brains clear. No man had brighter eyes or a clearer voice; and his resolute bearing and prompt replies, when excited, gave to his body a muscular power that imposed on strangers. I never doubted,—for he was indifferent to life, and prouder than Lucifer,—that, if he had drawn his sword in Greece or elsewhere, he would have thrown away the scabbard.—Trelawny's Recollections of the Last Days of Byron.

A Dacotah chap thinks he has found Paradise. Hear him: "No income tax; infernal revenue: no spies to see if you treat a friend on Sunday; no special police; no dog tax, no poll tax, school tax, or bounty fund; and, to end with, the Indians and half-breeds can't tell one greenback from another, so all our ones are tens."

AGENTS WANTED TO CANVASS FOR THE only official Southern History of the War. THE LOST CAUSE, by E. A. Pollard, the popular Historian of the South, and editor of the Richmond Examiner during the war. Complete in one large royal octavo volume, with
24 FINE STEEL PORTRAITS,
giving a full and authentic account of the rise and fall of the late Southern Confederacy. Written under the encouragement of Generals R. E. Lee, Johnston, Beauregard and others. The work is being liberally patronized by leading men of all classes, eager to hear
"THE OTHER SIDE,"
and thus arrive at the truth of history, which it is impossible to do from the many histories written only from a Northern stand-point.
Agents and the public are cautioned against any other work purporting to be this one. To energetic men and women a rare chance is offered to make money. Don't fail to send for circulars of this great and important work. Adddress

AYER'S
Cathartic Pills,

ARE THE MOST PERFECT purgative which we are able to produce, or which we think has ever yet been made by anybody. Their effects have abundantly shown to the community how much they excel the ordinary medicines in use. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. Their penetrating properties stimulate the vital activities of the body, remove the obstructions from its organs, purify the blood, and expel disease. They purge out the foul humors which breed and grow distemper, stimulate sluggish or disordered organs into their natural action, and impart a healthy tone with strength to the whole system. Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases. While they produce powerful effects, they are at the same time, in diminished doses, the safest and best physic that can be employed for children. Being sugar-coated, they are pleasant to take; and, being purely vegetable, are free from any risk of harm. Cures have been made which surpass belief, were they not substantiated by men of such exalted position and character, as to forbid the suspicion of untruth. Many eminent clergymen and physicians have lent their names to certify to the public the reliability of our remedies, while others have sent us the assurance of their conviction that our Preparations contribute immensely to the relief of our afflicted, suffering fellow men.
The Agent below named is pleased to furnish gratis our American Almanac, containing directions for the use and certificates of their cures, of the following complaints.
Costiveness, Bilious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache arising from foul stomach, Nausea, Indigestion, Morbid Inaction of the Bowels and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Diseases which require an evacuant medicine. They also, by purifying the blood and stimulating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach, such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability, Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout, and other kindred complaints arising from a low state of the body, or obstruction of its functions.
Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand AYER'S and take no others. The sick want the best aid there is for them, and they should have it.
Prepared by J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by

REMARKABLE HISTORY OF A REBEL TORPEDO-BOAT.

THE following eventful history of a torpedo-boat is taken from Gen. Maury's report of the defence of Mobile. The vessel, which was built of boiler-iron, was about thirty-five feet long, and was manned by a crew of nine men, eight of whom worked the propeller by hand. The ninth steered the boat, and regulated her movements below the surface of the water. She could be submerged at pleasure to any desired depth, or could be propelled upon the surface. In smooth, still water, her movements were exactly controlled, and her speed was about forty knots. It was intended that she should approach any vessel lying at anchor, pass under her keel, and drag a floating torpedo, which would explode on striking the side or bottom of the ship attacked. She could remain submerged more than half an hour without inconvenience to her crew. Soon after her arrival in Charleston, Lieutenant Payne, of the Confederate Navy, with eight others, volunteered to attack the Federal fleet with her. While preparing for their expedition the swell of a passing steamer caused her to sink suddenly, and all hands, except Lieutenant Payne, who at that moment was standing in the open hatchway, perished. She was soon raised, and again made ready for service. Lieutenant Payne again volunteered to command her. While lying near Fort Sumter she capsized, and again sunk in deep water, drowning all hands except her commander and two others. Being again raised and prepared for action, Mr. Aunley, one of her constructors, made an experimental cruise with her on Cooper River. While submerged at great depth, from some unknown cause she became unmanageable, and remained for many days at the bottom of the river with her crew of nine dead men. A fourth time was the boat raised, and Lieutenant Dixon, of Mobile, of the 21st Volunteers, with eight others, went out of Charleston Harbor in her, and attacked and sunk the Federal steamer, Housatonic. Her mission at last accomplished, she disappeared forever with her crew. Nothing is known of their fate, but it is believed they went down with the enemy.

A TOBACCO-CHEWING MULE.—A man who has been on a collecting tour in Michigan states that while standing on the street in the town of Commerce, in conversation with a gentleman, he felt something at his back, tugging at him. On turning around to see what it could be, he was astonished to see a mule standing with his head at his back, and remarked to the gentleman that the mule must be a pet. "Yes," said he. "The fellow wants a chew of tobacco." Our friend laughed at the idea, but the gentleman said that was what he was after. So he put his hand in his pocket and took out a piece of tobacco from his plug, and gave it to the mule, and it went off quite satisfied, chewing away as if it understood the business. After the mule had walked off down street chewing his tobacco, the gentleman stated that it was a regular tobacco-chewer, and when it wished a chew it would walk up to the door of some groceries, the grocer would hand it a chew, and the mule would go on his way rejoicing.

A BOY Down East was accustomed to go out on a railroad track and imitate the steam whistle so perfectly as to ofttimes deceive the officer at the station. His last attempt proved eminently successful; for the depot-master came out and "switched him off." Smart boy!

CON. PICKED OUT OF A COMMON SEWER.—Why is the Grover & Baker Sewing Machine such a favorite with the ladies? Ans. Because there is such a good "Feller" connected with it.

"Tut, tut, my son," said the father, "nobody would believe them."

STOP THAT COUGHING.

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure. but

NEWELL'S

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded or the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup

Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup.

MARTHA WASHINGTON

HAIR RESTORER.

THIS IS A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY, and stands above comparison with any other article for the Hair ever brought before the public.

A PERFECT

Hair Restorer AND Hair Dresser

BOTH COMBINED IN ONE.

First—It is not a Dye.
Second—Will not Color the Skin.
Third—Will restore Gray Hair to a beautiful Black, Brown, Auburn, or whatever might have been its original color, and cause it to assume its former beauty.
Fourth—Will cure all Humors and Diseases of the Scalp.
Fifth—Will remove Dandruff and Scurf from the head, and keep the hair moist and silk like in its appearance as in youthful days.
Sixth—Will promote a healthy growth.
Seventh—Will prevent it from falling off, and cause it to grow on bald heads where there is life and vitality at the roots, but where these are gone there is no hope of success.
Eighth—The best testimony that can be given will be found inside of each bottle.

Warranted to do all we claim for it, or the money refunded after using two bottles. Try it and be convinced.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy. It is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

TRUTH.

ADHERE rigidly and undeviatingly to the truth; but while you express what is true, express it in a pleasing manner. Truth is the picture, the manner is the frame that displays it to advantage. Truth, conveyed in austere and acrimonious language, seldom has a salutary effect, since we reject the truth, because we are prejudiced against the mode of communication. The heart must be won before the intellect can be formed. A man may betray the cause of truth by his unseasonable zeal, as he destroys the effect by the acrimony of his manner. Whoever would be a successful instructor must first become a mild and affectionate friend. He who gives way to angry invective furnishes a strong presumption that his cause is bad, since truth is best supported by dispassionate argument. The love of truth, refusing to associate itself with the selfish and dissocial passions, is gentle, dignified and persuasive. The understanding may not be long able to withstand the demonstrative evidence; but the heart which is guarded by prejudice and passion is generally proof against argumentative reasoning, for no person will perceive truth when he is unwilling to find it. Many of our speculative opinions, even those which are the result of laborious research, and the least liable to disputation, resemble rarities in the cabinet if the curious, which may be interesting to the possessor, and to a few congenial minds, but which are of no use to the world. Many of our speculative opinions cease to engage attention, not because we are agreed about their truth or fallacy, but because we are tired of the controversy. They sink into neglect, and, in a future age, their futility or absurdity is acknowledged, when they retain a hold no longer on the prejudices and passions of mankind.

MARRY.—Jeremy Taylor says, if you are for pleasure, marry; if you prize rosy health, marry; and even if money be your object, marry. A good wife is Heaven's last best gift to man, his angel and minister of graces innumerable, his gem of many virtues, his casket of jewels. Her voice, the sweetest music; her smiles, his brightest day; her kiss, the guardian of his safety, the balsam of his life: her industry, his surest wealth; her economy, his safest steward; her lips, his faithful counsellors; her bosom, the softest pillow of his cares; and her prayers, the ablest advocates of Heaven's blessings on his head.

SILENCE OF GREAT DEVELOPMENTS.—The gravest events dawn with no more noise than the morning star makes in rising. All great developments complete themselves in the world, and modestly wait in silence, praising themselves never, and announcing themselves not at all. We must be sensitive, and sensible, if we would see the beginnings and endings of great things. That is our part.

REFLECTION is a flower of the mind, giving out wholesome fragrance; reverie is the same flower when weak and running to seed.

THE poet sings of the deeds that shall be. He imagines the past; he forms the future.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND

IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

For sale by CALEB M. SICKLER, 422 Kearny street,

WHAT THEY EAT AT XENIA.

THE "Fat Contributor" gives the following experience of endeavoring to get dinner at Xenia, O., on the Little-Miami Railroad.

"Twenty minutes for dinner," shouted the brakesman as we approached Xenia.

Arrived there, I entered the dining-room, and inquired of a waiter,—

"What do you have for dinner?"

"Tweuty minutes, sir," was the hurried reply.

I told him I would try half a dozen minutes, raw, on the half-shell, just to see how they went. Requested him to make a minute of it on his hooks.

He scratched his head, trying to comprehend the order; but finally he gave it up, and waited on some one else.

I approached a man who stood at the door with a roll of money in his hand.

"What do you have for dinner?" I inquired of him.

"Half a dollar," said he.

I told him to give me half a dollar well done; and, in addition, asked him if he couldn't send me a boiled pocket-hook stuffed with greenbacks, and some seven-thirties garnished with postage-stamps and ten-cent scrip; also a confederate bond, done brown, with lettuce alone (let us alone.) I told him I would like to wash my dinner down with national bauk notes, on "draft." He said they were out of everything but the bauk-notes; and then he ordered the waiter to go to the bank, and "draw" some.

SCIENTIFIC FACTS.

ASSUMING the temperature of the interior of the earth to increase uniformly at the rate of one degree to every forty-five feet, at the depth of sixty miles the degree of heat would be sufficient to fuse all known substances.

The violence of the expansion of water when freezing is sufficient to cleave a globe of copper, of such thickness as to require a force of 28,000 pounds to produce a like effect.

As much nitrate of soda as can be hold between the thumb and fingers will preserve flowers for the space of a fortnight.

It is stated that soap manufactured from coal oil will remove all kinds of stains and dirt.

Heat rarefies air to such an extent that it can be made to occupy 5,550 times the space it did before.

The explosive force of close confined gunpowder is six and a half tons to the square inch.

The greatest artificial cold ever produced is ninety-one degrees Farhenheit.

During the conversion of ice into water, 140 degrees of heat are absorbed.

The mean annual depth of rain that falls at the equator is ninety-six inches.

Water, when converted into steam, increases in bulk 18,000 times.

PURSUIT OF PLEASURE.—We smile at the ignorance of the savage who cuts down the tree in order to reach its fruits; but the fact is, that a blunder of this description is made by every person who is over eager and impatient in the pursuit of pleasure. To such the present moment is everything and the future is nothing; he borrows, therefore, from the future at a most runious and usurious interest; and the consequence is that he finds the tone of his best feelings impaired, his self-respect diminished, his health of mind and body destroyed, and life reduced to its very dregs, at a time when, humanly speaking, the greater portion of its comforts should be still before him.

LIFE is the jailer of the soul in this filthy prison, and its only deliverer is death. What we call life is only death, and what we call death is a passport to life.

THE height of impudence—Taking shelter from the rain in an umbrella shop.

SHALL we call Mr. Field an aristocrat because he is so proud of his connections?

Action brought in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to PETER SHIELDS, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and for general relief and costs

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 1st day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six.

ESTATES UPON WHICH LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION HAVE BEEN ISSUED, BUT NO PROPERTY RECEIVED.

Letters of Administration have been issued on the following Estates, but no Money or other Property has come into the possession of the Administrator, nor any Fees received thereon. The Property of several Estates consists of claims to land not yet determined:

Robert Dyson, T. B. McManus, John J. Coombs, C. E. Trask, Wm. F. Hamilton, Charles S. Norris, Huling Major, Horace Cole, James E. Calhoun, J. W. Phipps, Julia W. Burns.

The foregoing report includes all the Estates administered upon by me during the year ending June 30th, 1866.

As a number of the Estates are still unsettled, the amount of Fees cannot be stated, but the same will, on final settlement, be 4 per cent. upon the amount administered in each Estate.

All of which is respectfully submitted,

J. W. BRUMAGIM,
Public Administrator.

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

In the matter of the Estate of EDWARD RODMAN, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of EDWARD F. STONE, the Administrator of the Estate of EDWARD RODMAN, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the Estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said Estate remains to be distributed to the heirs of said deceased; and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said Estate among the persons entitled,

It is ordered, that all persons interested in the Estate of EDWARD RODMAN, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the City and County of San Francisco, at the Court-room of said Court, in the City Hall in said City and County, on Thursday, the 29th day of November, 1866, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said Estate to the heirs of said EDWARD RODMAN, deceased, according to law.

And it is further ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks before said 29th day of November, 1866, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated October 24th, A. D. 1866.

NOTICE TO CREDITORS—ESTATE of FRANK O. ELDREDGE, deceased.—Notice is hereby given by the undersigned, Administrator, with the will annexed, of the Estate of Frank O. Eldredge, deceased, to the creditors of, and all persons having claims against, the said deceased, to exhibit them, with the necessary vouchers, within ten months after the first publication of this notice, to the undersigned, at his office, No. 605 Clay street, in the City and County of San Francisco.

Dated at San Francisco, October 25th, 1866.

JOHN S. BUGBEE,
Administrator, with the will annexed, of the Estate of Frank O Eldredge, deceased. oc27-5t

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California:

In the matter of the Estate of BENJAMIN P. GREEN, deceased.

It appearing to the Court, by the petition presented and filed by Thomas Courtis, the Administrator of the Estate of Benjamin P. Green, deceased, praying for an order to sell Real Estate, that it is necessary to sell the whole of the Real Estate to pay the debt outstanding against the deceased, and the debts, expenses, and charges of the administration,

It is therefore ordered by the Court, that all persons interested in the said Estate appear before the said Probate Court on Monday, the 25th day of November, A. D. 1866, at eleven o'clock A. M. of the said day, at the Court-room of said Probate Court, in the City Hall in said City and County of San Francisco, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administrator to sell the whole of the Real Estate of deceased, as prayed for in said petition; and that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated October 23d, A. D. 1866.

M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A HINT TO MR. WOODWARD.

MESSRS. EDITORS:—Woodward's Gardens are an ornament and a benefaction to San Francisco; they are the one green oasis, accessible to the general public, amid the Sahara of our sand-hills. They are the only pleasant and quiet suburban retreat we possess where our women and children can resort without the fear of encountering the more turbulent elements attracted by "lion and bear fights," rope-walking, and other sensational amusements. No liquors are sold upon the grounds, and no persons under the influence of liquor are to be found there. It is, in short, a delightful place of resort for those who wish to enjoy a quiet hour, away from the dust, the rush and whirl of the city.

I do trust that it may remain so; but I fear that with its increasing popularity the very features that have made it popular will be in danger of disappearing. I fear that sufficient pains are not taken to enforce the judicious rules laid down by the public-spirited proprietor. On Monday last, during a visit to this place, I saw a coarse, ruffianly-looking person deliberately march into the Art Gallery with a lighted cigar in his mouth. At the entrance of the garden is a tin sign with the inscription "No dogs admitted to the Gardens;" yet a dog following a lady visitor made himself a nuisance in the Art Gallery, while two children, just able to run about, (accompanying the same lady,) kept racing about the gallery, rubbing their fingers against the paintings that were within their reach, swinging by their hands upon the railing in front of the pictures, and vigorously kicking the frames with their feet.

I would suggest a little more vigilance on the part of those left in charge of the Gardens, and a more strict enforcement of the rules laid down by the proprietor. S. M. C.

THE DAILY PRESS AND THE SENSATION OF THE WEEK.

To the Editor of the Californian:

SIR:—I have been astonished at the course pursued by the daily papers with regard to a certain unpleasant affair that occurred in Brooklyn during the past week. Is it the legitimate province of the press to meddle with private matters in that way? Or is it not elsewhere considered beneath the dignity of leading daily journals? I had supposed that even in California native delicacy and human sympathy would incline to silence on a subject so strictly private, and one in which no laws either moral or civil have been violated. There is, it seems to me, an utter want of delicacy in the thing that must shock all persons of right feeling. The only charge brought against the gentleman is one of impecuniosity, or at least the only one that could stand the test of investigation, as of my own knowledge I can state that the charge of having made false representations in regard to his position, is false. The young lady was engaged to marry him, and the presumption therefore is, that she loved him. To no one who knows anything of a true woman's love would it occur that an inability on the part of her fiancée to raise sufficient money to pay the expenses of being married could in a moment change her feelings even to those of indifference. Therefore what must be her sufferings, in addition to the unnecessary exposure and publicity to have him thus falsely accused and ungenerously reproached. There are women so constituted that they would never again feel like facing the world after such an occurrence, and some to whom it would even prove a death-blow. What I consider the climax, is the curious "explanation" in the Bulletin, in which reference is made to a certain "church dignitary." The "church dignitary" can hardly be grateful, as it leaves him open to two serious imputations, (the natural inference being that he authorized the explanation or retraction.) it being too well and widely known that both he and his family indorsed the person alluded to, to admit of any statement to the contrary being credited. Again, the article in the Bulletin states that "he (the dignitary) was deceived as to the character of the person by whom his services had been engaged." Now what does this mean? What new development of character was there? The "church dignitary" had been heretofore acquainted with all the charges ever brought against the bridegroom, and yet he and members of his family gave him their indorsement and social countenance. The new charge is simply one of "impecuniosity." Again, the "church dignitary" would not feel grateful, as he is one of the few in California who can afford to forget the power that money gives, and to do justice though the public frown. I wish to be distinctly understood, I am not a defender of individuals, but of principles. I believe this man has been convicted of the one unpardonable sin in California. He might have proved to be a Rochester in libertinism, he would have been smiled on by the most pure; an Arnold in treachery, and so that he brought away his price, our leading men would have sought his friendship; a Meiggs in defaulting, and mothers would have thrown their daughters into his arms, the supposition being that he was rich; but as it is, the sooner he leaves these shores the better for him. There is a natural tendency toward persecution in California; Charity holds no place in her escutcheon, nor has she ever accepted as a motto, "good in all, none all good." The public makes up its mind whether a man is to be an angel or a devil, and, quite irrespective of his conduct, an angel or a devil is he.

SPIRADELLA.

THE NEW BANK OF CALIFORNIA.

We have received the following communication from the spirit land, which, as it bears somewhat upon an inquiry made by a correspondent in our last issue, we readily publish:

SPIRIT LAND (via Congress Hall), November, 1866.

DEAR CALIFORNIAN:—After having luxuriated in these blissful spheres for nearly three centuries, it is excessively annoying to be made suddenly the victim of calumnious persecution. Yet unquiet and evil-minded mortals have originated, and shallow-pated gossips have circulated the villainous assertion that the library of St. Marks upon the Piazzetta in Venice, better known now, however, as the Palazzio Regio, was stolen bodily from the designs for the Bank of California in your city. In refutation of the scandalous statement I need only tell you that I designed the library in 1536; and this, Scamozi, who completed it, is ready to verify. However much the architects of the bank may merit the high encomiums passed upon their work by the Flag, it is not seemly in them to disturb or connive at the disturbance of one so long retired from the rivalries and animosities of the profession as myself.

Your well known interest in art matters leads me to hope that you will give me a place in your excellent paper, of which I am a constant and delighted reader.

Yours with respect, JACOPI TATTI SANSOVINO.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A UNIVERSITY.

Messrs. Editors Californian:

Your correspondent, "W. S.," will find a general history and ample details concerning the ancient University constitution, and its latter changes, in a copy of The English Universities, by W. Huber, in three volumes, which may be found in the Mercantile Library.

Yours respectfully, BOBUS.

Messrs. Editors of the Californian:

Can any of your readers inform me who is the author of the ode recited at Charleston on the occasion of raising the statue of Calhoun? It commences—

"Nations are but the monuments of deathless men—"

We cannot furnish our correspondent with the information asked for. Possibly some reader of THE CALIFORNIAN may be able to do so.

[For the Californian.]

CONSCIENCE.

"Whatever creed be taught, or land be trod, Man's conscience is the oracle of God."

BYRON.

TELL me, O Conscience! what thou art,
That fires the brain and wrings the heart;
That haunts the guilty mind with fears,
And fills the eyes with bitter tears;
That keeps the memory on the rack,
By bringing recollections back;
That plays with feelings at thy will,
And tortures with consummate skill;
Whose task it is, by smile or frown,
To lift man up or drag him down;
Whose stings are keener far than steel
Which felons in dark dungeons feel.
The prince may golden favors shower,
Yet he is subject to thy power;
The priest may preach some creed of gloom,
And sing of bliss beyond the tomb;
But thou canst read his thoughts profound,
Lone Sentinel of sacred ground!

The hero honor's path may tread,
And his great name world-wide be spread;
But glory brings not peace of mind,
That jewel rare, so hard to find.
From thy dominion none can flee,
For mortals all must bow to thee!
Tell me, O Conscience! what thou art,
Weird Watchman of the human heart!

Art thou the child of wretched Care,
That murders Sleep and mocks Despair—
That fills with pangs the human breast,
And robs the guilty head of rest—
That mutely weeps o'er crimes untold,
Where Vice buys Virtue with its gold—
Whose records by some mystic hand
Are written in a fadeless land?
Tell me, O Conscience! what thou art,
Weird Watchman of the human heart!

The soul, that claims celestial birth,
Finds naught but tainted joys on earth;
Imprisoned in a cell of clay,
That yields to laws of swift decay—
Too pure for such a horrid hell,
Where shapeless fiends in anguish dwell—
The spirit tenant of the heart
Is ever yearning to depart;
Like some caged warbler, to be free,
That it may soar, O God, to thee!

O Conscience! mute, mysterious guest!
Man fain would pluck thee from his breast,
As if thou wert his deadly foe,
The only cause of human woe;
Could he but snatch thy golden crown,
And madly pull thy temple down,
Dark Vice would rear her bloody shrines,
Where perish hopes and Virtue pines;
Strike but the brave heart-monarch dumb,
And earth a desert would become.

When man can feel a conscience clear,
What wrongs and dangers need he fear?
Calmly at his departing breath,
It takes away the stings from death;
It nobly braves the coward world,
Till Reason from her throne be hurled;
With all the feelings of the heart
It gently plays a leading part,
In concert acting with the soul,
When passions wild brook no control;
Close by life's purple fountain found,
It guards the spot as holy ground.
Tell me, O Conscience! what thou art,
Weird Watchman of the human heart!

JAMES LINEN.

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 1866.

LIFE is a strange avenue of trees and flowers. Its beginning is edged with violets, a little path of lawny grass, and soft to tiny feet. Dark shadows soon hover among autumn's mellow tints; the soil grows damp; the air is chill; night cometh on apace.

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES,

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, an only son and spendthrift, walks down from London to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs. Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother, which results in his obtaining a ten-pound note, and a promise that she will forward him, within one month, a hundred and fifty pounds, to meet a note of indebtedness to one Routh, a friend and associate. After an interview of half an hour he leaves for the adjacent village of Amherst, where he passes the night. In the morning he changes the note, which bears a date and the post-mark of Amherst, to purchase an overcoat, and departs for London. In London, at the house of Stewart Routh, a gentlemanly gambler and adventurer of good accomplishments and address, the reader is introduced to his wife Harriet, commonly addressed by Routh as "Harry,"—a woman of rare mental qualifications and quick appreciation, thoroughly devoted to her husband, his counselor in all his schemes, and a most efficient aid in his precarious mode of living. One Deane, a cool, sharp, "posted" man, with abundant means, is also introduced, whose cleverness is even too much for the designs of Routh and his wife.

CHAPTER IV.

IN THE BALANCE.

NOT one word came from Mrs. Carruthers for full six weeks. The hope which had sprung up in George Dallas' breast after the interview with his mother in the housekeeper's room had gone through the various stages common to unfulfilled desires in men of sanguine temperaments. All he did know, to his sorrow, was, that she had not sent the money; all he knew, to his joy, was, that, though he was constantly seeing Stewart Routh, that worthy had, as yet, uttered no word of discontent at its non-appearance.

Not he! In the hand which Stewart Routh was at that moment playing in the greater game of life, the card representing a hundred and forty pounds was one on which he bestowed very little attention. It might, or it might not, form part of the odd trick, either way; but it had very little influence on his strategy and finesse. There were times when a five-pound note might have turned his chance, but this was not one of them.

When driven into a corner, pressed for the means of discharging paltry debts, harassed by dunning creditors, Stewart Routh would have needed and claimed the money due to him by George Dallas. Present circumstances were more favorable, and he only needed George Dallas' assistance in his schemes. He was "in for a large thing" just at this time.

If he took a hand at cards, though from mere habit he played closely and cautiously, yet he made no great points, and was by no means, as usual, the dashing Paladin round whose chair men gathered thickly, and whose play they backed cheerily. No! The paltry gains of the dice-box and cards paled before the glamor of the fortune to be made in companies and shares; the genius which had hitherto been confined to "bridging" a pack of cards, or "securing" a die, talking over a flat or winning money of a greenhorn, was to have its vent in launching a great City Company. Of this scheme Dallas knew nothing. Routh was always sending to him to call, always glad to see him when he called, and never plagued him with allusions to his debt. But in their interviews nothing but mere generalities were discussed, and George noticed that he always received a hint to go, whenever Mr. Deane was announced.

But although Stewart Routh was seen but seldom in his usual haunts, he was by no means inactive or neglectful of his own interests. Day after day he spent several hours in the City, diligently engaged in the formation of his new Company —a grand undertaking for working some newly discovered silver mines in the Brazils; and day after day were his careful scheming, his elaborate plotting, his vivacious daring, and his consummate knowledge of the world rewarded by the steady progress which the undertaking made.

The temporary offices of Tokenhouse-yard were besieged with inquiries; good brokers with City names of high standing offered their services; splendid reports came from the engineers, who had been sent out to investigate the state of the mines. Only one thing was wanting, and that was capital; capital by hook or by crook, Mr. Stewart Routh must have, and was determined to have. If the affair were to be launched, the brokers said, the next week must see it done; and the difficulty of raising the funds for the necessary preliminary expenses was becoming day by day more and more palpable and insurmountable to Stewart Routh.

The interval of time that had witnessed so much activity on the part of Mr. Stewart Routh, and had advanced his schemes close to a condition of imminent crisis, had been productive of nothing new or remarkable in the existence of George Dallas. That is to say, on the surface of it. He was still leading the desultory life of a man who, with an intellectual and moral nature capable of better deeds and nobler aspirations, is incurably weak, impulsive, and swayed by a love of pleasure; a man incapable of real self-control, and with whom the gratification of the present is potent, above all suggestions or considerations of the contingencies of the future. He worked a little, and his talent was beginning to tell on the popularity of the paper for which he worked, The Mercury, and on the perceptions of its proprietors. George Dallas was a man in whose character there were many contradictions.

With much of the fervor of the poetic temperament, with its sensuousness and its sensitiveness, he had a certain nonchalance about him, a fitful indifference to external things and a spasmodic impatience of his surroundings. This latter was apt to come over him at times when he was apparently merriest, and it had quite as much to do with his anxiety to get his debt to Routh discharged, and to set himself free from Routh, as any moral sense of the danger of keeping such company, or any moral consciousness of the waste of his life, and the deterioration of his character. George Dallas had no knowledge of the true history of Routh's career; of the blacker shades of his character he was entirely ignorant. In his eyes, Routh was a clever man, and a good for-nothing—a "black sheep" like himself, a sheep for whose blackness Dallas (as he did in his own case) held circumstances, the white sheep, anything and everything except the man himself, to blame. He was dimly conscious that his associate was stronger than he—stronger in will, stronger in knowledge of men, and somehow, though he never defined or acknowledged the feeling to himself, he mistrusted and feared him. He liked him, too; he felt grateful for his help; he did not discern the disinterested motives which actuated him, and, indeed, they were but small, and would by no means have accounted for all Routh's proceedings towards Dallas. Nor is it necessary that they should; a villain is not, therefore, altogether precluded from likings, or even the feebler forms of friendship, and Dallas was not simply silly and egotistical when he believed that Routh felt kindly and warmly towards him.

Still, whether a merciful and occult influence was at work within him, or the tide of his feelings had been turned by his stolen interviews with his mother, by his being brought into such positive contact with her life and its conditions, and having been made to realize the bitterness he had infused into it, it were vain to inquire. Whatever his motives, however mixed their nature or confused their origin, he was filled, whenever he was out of Routh's presence, and looked his life in the face, with an ardent longing to "cut the whole concern," as he phrased it in his thoughts. And Harriet?—for the "whole concern" included her, as he was forced to remember—Harriet, the only woman whose society he liked, Harriet, whom he admired with an admiration as pure and respectful as he could have felt for her, had he met her in the least equivocal, nay, even in the most exalted position. Well, he would be very sorry to lose Harriet, but, after all, she cared only for Routh; and he was dangerous. "I must turn over a new leaf for her sake" (he meant for his mother's), "and I can't turn it while they are at my elbows."

George Dallas was more than usually occupied with such thoughts one morning, six weeks after his unsuccessful visit to Poynings. He had been very much with Routh and Deane during this period, and yet he had begun to feel aware, with a jealous and suspicious sense of it, too, that he really knew very little of what they had been about. They met in the evening, in pursuit of pleasure, and they abandoned themselves to it; or they met at Routh's lodging, and Dallas surrendered himself to the charm which Harriet's society always had for him. But he had begun to observe of late that there was no reference to the occupation of the earlier part of the day, and that while there was apparently a close bond of mutual confidence or convenience between Routh and Deane, there was some under-current of mutual dislike.

"If my mother can only get me out of this scrape, and I can get the Piccadilly people to take my serial," said George Dallas to himself one morning, when April was half gone, and "the season" was half come, "I shall get away somewhere, and go in for work in earnest." He looked, ruefully enough, round the wretched little bedroom, at whose small window he was standing, as he spoke; and he thought impatiently of his debt to his coarse, shrewish landlady, and of the small liabilities which hampered him as effectually as the great one.

It was later than his usual hour of rising, and he felt ill and despondent: not anxious to face the gay, rich, busy world outside, and still less inclined for his own company and waking thoughts in the shabby little den he tenanted. A small room, a mere apology for a sitting-room, was reached through a rickety folding-door, which no human ingenuity could contrive to keep shut, if any one opened the other door leading to the narrow passage and the top of the steep dark staircase. Through this yawning aperture George lounged disconsolately into the little room beyond, eyeing with strong disfavor the preparations for his breakfast, which preparations chiefly consisted of a dirty table-cloth and a portion of a stale loaf, popularly known as a "heel." But his gaze travelled further, and brightened; for on the cracked and blistered wooden chimney-piece lay a letter in his mother's hand. He darted at it, and opened it eagerly, then held it for a moment in his hand unread. His face turned very pale, and he caught his breath once or twice as he muttered—

"Suppose it's to say she can't do anything at all." But the fear, the suspense, were over with the first glance at his mother's letter. She wrote:

"POYNINGS, 13th April, 1861.

"MY DEAR GEORGE: I have succeeded in procuring you the money, for which you tell me you have such urgent need. Perhaps if I admired, and felt disposed to act up to a lofty standard of sentimental generosity, I should content myself with making this announcement, and sending you the sum which you assure me will release you from your difficulties, and enable you to commence the better life on which you have led me to hope you are resolved. But, not only do the circumstances under which I have contrived to get this money for you make it impossible for me to act in this way, but I consider I should be very wrong, and quite wanting in my duty, if I failed to make you understand, at the cost of whatever pain to myself, the price I have had to pay for the power of aiding you.

"You have occasioned me much suffering, George. You, my only child, to whom I looked in the first dark days of my early bereavement, with such hope and pride as I cannot express, and as only a mother can understand—you have darkened my darkness and shadowed my joy, you have been the source of my deepest anxiety, though not the less for that, as you well know, the object of my fondest love. I don't write this to reproach you—I don't believe in the efficacy of reproach; but merely to tell you the truth—to preface another truth, the full significance of which it may prove beneficial to you to understand. Sorrow I have known through you, and shame I have experienced for you. You have cost me many tears, whose marks can never be effaced from my face or my heart; you have cost me infinite disappointment, bitterness, heart-sickness, and domestic wretchedness; but now, for the first time, you cost me shame on my own account.

"Many and great as my faults and shortcomings have been through life, deceit was equally abhorrent to my nature and foreign to my habits. But for you, George, for your sake, to help you in this strait, to enable you to release yourself from the trammels in which you are held, I have descended to an act of deceit and meanness, the recollection of which must forever haunt me with a keen sense of humiliation. I retain enough of my former belief in you, my son, to hope that what no other argument has been able to effect this confession on my part may accomplish, and that you, recognizing the price at which I have so far rescued you, may pause, and turn from the path leading downward into an abyss of ruin, from which no effort of mine could avail to snatch you. I have procured the money you require, by an expedient suggested to me accidentally, just when I had begun utterly to despair of ever being able to accomplish my ardent desire, by a conversation which took place at dinner between Mr. Carruthers and his family solicitor, Mr. Tatham. The conversation turned on a curious and disgraceful family story which had come under his knowledge lately. I need not trouble you to read, nor myself to write, its details; you will learn them when I see you, and give you the money; and I do not doubt, I dare not doubt, George, that you will feel all I expect you to feel, when you learn to how deliberate, laborious, and mean a deception I have descended for your sake.

"I can never do the same thing again; the expedient is one that it is only possible to use once, and which is highly dangerous even in that one instance. So, if even you were bad and callous enough to calculate upon a repetition of it, which I could not believe, my own dear boy, I am bound to tell you that it could never be. Unless Mr. Carruthers should change his mind, consequent upon an entire, radical, and most happy change in your conduct, all pecuniary assistance on my part must be entirely impossible. I say this, thus strongly, out of the kindest and best motives towards you. Your unexpected appearance and application agitated and distressed me very much; not but that the sight of you, under any circumstances, must always give me pleasure, however closely pursued and overtaken by pain. For several days I was so completely upset by the recollection of your visit, and the strong and desperate necessity that existed for repressing all traces of such feelings, that I was unable to think over the expedients by which I might procure the money you required. Then as I began to grow a little quieter, accident gave me the hint upon which I have acted secretly and safely. Come down to Poynings in three days from this time. Mr. Carruthers is at present away at an agricultural meeting at York, and I can see you at Amherst without difficulty or danger. Go to the town, but not to the inn. Wait about until you see my carriage. This is the 13th. I shall expect you on the 17th, by which day I hope to have the money ready for you.

"And now, my dear boy, how shall I end this letter? What shall I say? What can I say that I have not said again and again, and with sadly little effect, as you will not deny? But I forbear, and I hope. A feeling that I cannot define, an instinct, tells me that a crisis in my life is near. And what can such a crisis in my life mean, except in reference to you, my beloved and only child? In your hands lies all the future, all the disposition of the 'few and evil years' which remain to me. How are you going to deal with them? Is the love, which can never fail or falter, to be tried and wounded to the end, George, or is it to see any fruition in this world? Think over this question, my son, and let me read in your face, when I see you, that the answer is to be one of hope. You are much changed, George; the bitterness is succeeding the honey in your mouth; you are 'giving your strength for that which is not meat, and your labor for that which satisfieth not,' and though all the lookers-on at such a career as yours can see, and always do see, its emptiness and insufficiency plainly, what does their wisdom, their experience, avail? But if wisdom and experience come to yourself, that makes all the difference. If you have learned, and I venture to hope you have, that the delusive light is but a 'Will of the Wisp,' you will cease to pursue it. Come to me, then, my boy. I have kept my word to you at such a cost as you can hardly estimate, seeing that no heart can impart all its bitterness to another; will you keep yours to me?

"C. L. CARRUTHERS."

"What does she mean? What can she mean?" George Dallas asked himself this question again and again, as he stood looking at the letter in his hand. "What has she done? A mean and deliberate deceit—some dishonorable transaction? My mother could not do anything deserving to be so called. It is impossible. Even if she could contemplate such a thing, she would not know how to set about it. God bless her!"

He sat down by the table, drew the dingy Britannia metal teapot over beside his cup, and sat with his hand resting idly upon the distorted handle, still thinking less of the relief which the letter had brought him, than of the mysterious terms in which it was couched.

"She can't have got it out of Carruthers without his knowing anything about it?" he mused. "No; besides, getting it from him at all is precisely the thing she told me she could not do. Well, I must wait to know; but how good of her to get it! Who's the fellow who says a man can have only one mother? By Jove, how right he is!"

Then George ate his breakfast hastily, and, putting the precious letter in his breast-pocket, went to Routh's lodgings.

"I dare say they're not up," he thought, as he knocked at the door, and patiently awaited the lingering approach of the slipshod servant. "Routh was as late as I was last night, and I know she always sits up for him."

He was right; they had not yet appeared in the sitting-room, and he had time for a good deal of walking up and down, and much cogitation over his mother's letter, before Harriet appeared. She was looking anxious, Dallas thought, so he stepped forward even more eagerly than usual, and told her in hurried tones of gladness that the post had brought him good news, and that his mother was going to give him the money.

"I don't know how she has contrived to get it, Mrs. Routh," he said.

"Does she not tell you, then?" asked Harriet, as she eyed with some curiosity the letter which Dallas had taken out of his pocket, and which he turned about in his hand, as he stood talking to her. As she spoke, he replaced the letter in his pocket, and sat down.

"No," he answered, moodily, "she does not; but she did not get it easily, I know—not without a very painful self-sacrifice; but here's Routh."

"Ha! Dallas, my boy," said Routh, after he had directed one fleeting glance of inquiry towards his wife, and almost before he had fairly entered the room. "You're early; any news?"

"Very good news," replied Dallas; and he repeated the information he had already given Harriet. Routh received it with a somewhat feigned warmth, but Dallas was too much excited by his own feelings to perceive the impression which the news really produced on Routh.

"Is your letter from the great Mr. Carruthers himself?" said Routh; "from the provincial magnate who has the honor of being step-father to you—your magnificent three-tailed bashaw?"

"O dear, no!" said the young man, grimly; "not from him. My letter is from my mother."

"And what has she to say?" asked Harriet, quickly.

"She tells me she will very shortly be able to let me have the sum I require."

"The dence she will!" said Routh. "Well, I congratulate you, my boy! I may say I congratulate all of us, for the matter of that; but it's rather unexpected, isn't it? I thought that Mrs. Carruthers told you, when you saw her so lately, that the chances of her bleeding that charming person, her husband, were very remote."

"She did say so, and she was right; it's not from him she's going to get the money. Thank Heaven for that!"

"Certainly, if you wish it, though I'm not sure that we're right in being over-particular whence the money comes, so that it does come when one wants it. What is that example in the Eton Latin Grammar—'I came to her in season, which is the chief thing of all?' But if not from Mr. Carruthers, where does she get the money?"

"I—I don't know; but she does not get it without some horrible self-sacrifice; you may depend on that."

"My dear George, Mrs. Carruthers' case is not a singular one. We none of us get money without an extraordinary amount of self-sacrifice."

"Not a singular one! No, by George, you're right there, Routh," said the young man, bitterly; "but does that make it any lighter for her to bear, or any better for me to reflect upon? There are hundreds of vagabond sons in England at this moment, I dare say, outcasts—sources of shame and degradation to their mothers, utterly useless to any one. I swear, when I think of what my mother must have gone through to raise this money, when I think of the purpose for which it is required, I thoroughly loathe myself, and feel inclined to put a pistol to my head or a razor to my throat. However, once free, I—there—that's the old cant again!"

As the young man said these words, he rose from his chair, and fell to pacing the room with long strides. Stewart Routh looked up sternly at him from under his bent brows, and was about to speak; but Harriet held up a finger deprecatingly, and when George Dallas seated himself again, and, with his face on his hands, remained moodily gazing at the table, she stole behind him and laid her hand on his shoulder.

BEECHER ON BOYS.

A BOY is a picture of existence quite separate from all things else, and deserves separate chapters in the natural history of man. The real lives of boys are yet to be written. The lives of pious and good boys, which enrich the catalogues of great publishing societies, resemble a real boy's life about as much as a chicken picked and larded, upon a spit, and ready for delicious eating, resembles a fowl in the fields. With some few honorable exceptions, they are impossible boys, with incredible goodness. Their piety is monstrous. A man's experience stuffed into a little boy, is simply monstrous. And we are soundly skeptical of this whole pate de fois gras piety. Apples that ripen long before their times are either diseased or worm-bitten.

So long as boys are babies, how much are they cherished! But by-and-by the cradle is needed for another. From the time that a babe becomes a boy until he is a young man, he is in an anomalous condition, for which there is no special place assigned in nature. They are always doing something to call down rebuke. They are as inquisitive as monkeys, and meddlesome just where you don't wish them to be. Boys have a period of mischief as much as they have of measles or chicken-pox. They invade your drawers, mix up your tooth-powder with hair-oil, pull your laces and collars from their repositories, upset your ink upon invaluable manuscript, tear up precious letters, scatter your wafers, stick everything up with experimental sealing-wax, and spoil all your pens in the effort at spoiling all your paper.

Poor boys! What are they good for? It is an unfathomable mystery that we come to our manhood (as the Israelites reached Canaan) through the wilderness of boyhood. They are always wanting something they must not have, going where they ought not to be, coming where they are not wanted, saying the most awkward things at the most critical times. They will tell lies; and after infinite pains to teach them the obligations of truth, they give us the full benefit of frankness and literalness by blurting out before company a whole budget of family secrets. Would you take a quiet nap? Slam-bang go a whole bevy of boys through the house! Has the nervous baby, at length, after all manner of singings, trottings, soothings, and maternal bosom-opiates, just fallen asleep? Be sure an unmannerly boy will be on hand to bawl out for permission to do something or other which he has been doing all day without dreaming of leave. Who shall describe the daily battle of the hair and the bath, the ordeal of aprons for the table, the placing and moving up, and the endless task of good manners? If there is one saint that ought to stand higher than another on the calendar, it is a patient, sweet-tempered children's nurse! Talk of saintship, simply because a man lived in a cave, and was abstemious, or because he died bravely at the stake! What are fagots of fiery sticks for a few hot moments, compared to those animated fagots which consume nurses and governesses for months and years, to say nothing of the occasional variety of parental coals?

Are we, then, not on the boy's side? To be sure we are. It is not their fault that they are boys, nor that older people are not patient. The restless activity of boys is their necessity. To restrain it, is to thwart nature. We need to provide for it—not to attempt to find amusement for them, but to give them opportunity to amuse themselves.

WHY is love like a Scotch plaid? Because it is all stuff, and often crossed.

LONGING FOR RAIN.

EARTH swoons, o'erwhelmed with weight of bloom;
The scanty dews seem dropped in vain;
Athirst she lies, while garish skies
Burn with their brassy hints of rain.

Morn after morn the flaming sun
Smites the bare hills with fiery rod;
Night after night with blood-red light
Glares like a slow avenging god.

O for a cloudy curtain drawn
To screen us from the scorching sky!
O for the rain to lay again
The smothering dust-clouds passing by!

To wash the hedges, white with dust,
Freshen the grass, and fill the pool;
While in the breeze the odorous trees
Drip softly, swaying dark and cool!

WAVES.

IT is not a little remarkable that an element like water, one of the prime principles of which is, that it always tends to seek a level, should be so liable to agitation, and that when in large masses it should in reality so seldom be at rest. But its very fluidity, which is the cause of its tendency to a state of quietude, is also the reason for its constant agitation. It requires but a breath of air to disturb its placidity with ripples, and the increase of the breeze, especially where there is a large area, rolls it up in waves until the surface of the sea becomes alternate hills and valleys.

One might suppose that the wind would pass smoothly over the face of the water without exciting any great commotion, the contrast in the density of the two elements being so great; but it requires only a few moments for a strong wind to lash the ocean into fury, and to cause its waves to rise, as the phrase goes, mountain high. This expression, however, is mere hyperbole. The actual height of waves is far below the ordinary estimate.

Easily as the surface of the water is disturbed by the wind and raised into waves, it appears that there is a certain height beyond which it is not liable to be raised by any ordinary gales. The height is seldom, if ever, more than ten feet, which, with the corresponding depression between the waves, would make the elevation above the trough of the sea twenty feet. Most persons who have been at sea in a storm, and who have carefully watched the approach of the mighty swells, which, as they are coming on, threaten to overwhelm even the largest vessel, would be ready to assert that they have seen waves at least fifty or sixty feet in height; but all above twenty, or at the utmost twenty-five feet, is in the imagination.

Of course no accurate measurement of the waves can be made at sea, but an approximation to gauging them has often been reached, and under the most favorable circumstances, with the above result. Where a wave strikes an opposing object, as upon a bold shore, or against a rock or light-house, the water is dashed up to a far greater height; but twenty feet may be set down as the height of the loftiest mountain-wave that is seen at sea, the assertions of young and old voyagers to the contrary notwithstanding.

The velocity of waves is a far more curious and interesting subject of investigation. Of course it is understood by all who have acquaintance with the matter, that the water itself does not move forward with the wave, even when it attains the greatest velocity. Only the form of the wave advances, the wave itself seeming to have a separate existence from the water, and holding on its course with tremendous speed and power, while the particles of water, and the entire mass of the fluid, simply rise and sink, being made the sport of one wave after another as the succession comes on. When waves come in from the deep sea and strike upon a shoal, or upon a shelving shore, they then make progress, not by the force of the wind, but only on the principle of the water seeking its own level. The velocity of the waves is in proportion to their magnitude, the largest proceeding at double the rate of the fleetest steamships, or about forty miles an hour. Those who are familiar with the sea have often, when running before the wind, watched their progress, seeing one after another, with regular intervals, sweeping by and leaving the ship far behind.

The power of the waves is tremendous, and this force is almost a mystery, when we hear in mind the fact just stated, that it is only the form, and not the substance, which moves. Those who have felt the successive blows of these mighty trip-hammers against the sides or bows of a ship when the ocean has been violently agitated, can scarcely believe that the entire mass of water has not been hurled with immense velocity against the vessel. And when these waves come rolling in upon a shallow bank their force is greatly increased, so that the bulwarks must be strong indeed that can withstand their shocks.

PRECEPTS are like seed—they are little things, which do much good. If the mind which receives them has a disposition, it must not be doubted that this part contributes to the generation, and adds much to that which has been collected.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications.]

GREELEY'S American Conflict, the second volume of which is just issued, will be found, judging from such portions of it as we have examined, the most satisfactory and reliable, as well as the most readable of the numerous histories of the war thus far published. The narrative is clear and spirited, the descriptions graphic, and the writer evinces more sagacity and insight than any of his rivals or predecessors in his attempt to trace the causes of events and their sequences.

The following extracts will furnish an idea of Mr. Greeley's general style and spirit as a writer of history:

GRANT'S CAMPAIGN OF 1864.

"Grant's conduct of this campaign was not satisfactory to the Confederate critics, who gave a decided preference to the strategy of McClellan. They held that the former aimed only to overpower and crush by brute force—by the employment of overwhelming numbers—and by a lavish expenditure of blood. Doubtless a great military genius, such as appears once in two or three centuries, might have achieved them at a smaller cost; as a timid, hesitating, purposeless commander would have failed to achieve them at all. The merit which may be fairly claimed for Grant is that of resolutely undertaking a very difficult and formidable task, and executing it to the best of his ability—at all events, doing it. That when south of the James, he was just where the rebels wished him not to be, they showed by desperate and hazardous efforts to draw him thence; and the truth was duplicated in the final collapse of the rebellion.

"Other campaigns were more brilliant, but none contributed more positively and eminently to break the power of the Confederates than that which began on the Rapidan and ended in front of Petersburg and across the Weldon road."

He pronounces the following judgment upon the efficiency of

NEGRO TROOPS.

"Though some of our Generals regarded them with disfavor, while others were loud in their praise, it is no longer fairly disputable that they played a very important and useful part in the overthrow of the rebellion. Though they were hardly allowed to participate in any of the great battles whereby the issue was determined, they bore an honorable part in many minor actions and sieges, especially in those of 1864–5. In docility, in unquestioning obedience to superiors, in local knowledge, in capacity to endure fatigue, in ability to brave exposure and resist climatic or miasmatic perils, they were equal, if not superior, to the average of our white troops; in intelligence and tenacity they were inferior; and no wise General would have counted a corps of them equal, man for man, in a great, protracted battle, to a like number of our whites. Yet there were black regiments above the average of whites in merit, and their fighting at Fort Wagner, Port Hudson, Helena, Mobile and some other points, was noticed by their commanders with well-deserved commendation. To exalt them to the disparagement of our white soldiers would be as unwise as unjust; but those whites who fought most bravely by their side will be the last to detract from the gratitude wherewith the Republic fitly honors all her sons who freely offered their lives for the salvation of their country."

Among the Generals toward whom the author seems to lean with a perhaps unhistorical partiality, is Gen. Rosecrans. He thus speaks of that officer's conduct at

STONE RIVER.

"Almost any General but Rosecrans would have supposed that there was but one point to be considered: how to get back to Washington with the least additional loss. But Rosecrans took stock of his ammunition, and found that there was enough left for another battle; so he resolved to stay. * * * On a calm review of this day's desperate and doubtful carnage, there cannot be a doubt that the battle was saved after it had been lost; and that the man who saved it was William S. Rosecrans. Thousands had done nobly—Thomas, Sheridan, Wood, Rousseau, Palmer, Van Cleve, and others, eminently so— but the day might have been saved without any of them; while without Rosecrans it must have been lost. It was he who, when apprized too late of the sudden and utter demolition of his right wing, instantly pushed up Rossean from his centre to its relief, and hurried across Van Cleve's and other divisions from the left to stay the tide of rebel success; it was he who—Van Cleve having just fallen—led the charge by a part of his division, which finally arrested the rebels and repelled their advance on our right—Rosseau forthwith emulating his example, charging desperately the enemy in his front, and hurling them back into the cedars with fearful loss on both sides, but with prisoners taken by ours only. And when, later in the day, the storm of battle rolled around to our centre and left, falling heavily on Palmer's and Wood's division, Rosecrans was there, directing, encouraging, steadying; though the head of his Chief of Staff, Garesche, was blown to pieces by a shell while riding by the General's side, and three or four others of his staff or escort were wounded—one of them mortally—and as many more lost their horses. To Garesche he was deeply attached, they two being Roman Catholics, as were none others of his military family—but he was too intent on his work to seem to heed the fall of his beloved friend; and when another of his staff said to him, 'Garesche is dead,' 'I am very sorry,' was the quiet response, 'but we cannot help it.' Soon word came (erroneously), 'McCook is killed.' 'We cannot help it,' was the General's calm reply; 'this battle must be won.' And it was won."

We must conclude our extracts with a touching and noble passage describing the disbanding of Lee's army, when it was found that the cause of the Rebellion was lost:

"The parting of Lee with his devoted followers was a sad one. Of the proud army, which, dating its victories from Bull Run, had driven McClellan from before Richmond, and withstood his best effort at Antietam, and shattered Burnside's host at Fredericksburg, and worsted Hooker at Chancellorsville, and fought Meade so stoutly, though unsuccessfully, before Gettysburg, and baffled Grant's bounteous resources and desperate efforts in the Wilderness, at Spottsylvania, on the North Anna, at Cold Harbor, and before Petersburg and Richmond, a mere wreck remained. It is said that 27,000 were included in Lee's capitulation; but of these not more than 10,000 had been able to carry their arms thus far on their hopeless and almost foodless flight. Barely nineteen miles from Lynchburg when surrendered, the physical possibility of forcing their way thither, even at the cost of half their number, no longer remained. And, if they were all safely there, what then? The resources of the Confederacy were utterly exhausted. Of the 120,000 men whose names were on its muster rolls a few weeks ago, at least one-third were already disabled or prisoners, and the residue could neither be clad nor fed—not to dream of their being fitly armed or paid; while the resources of the loyal States were scarcely touched, their ranks nearly or quite as full as ever, and their supplies of ordnance, small arms, munitions, etc., more numerous than in any previous April. Of the million or so borne on our muster-rolls, probably not less than half were in active service, with half so many more able to take the field at short notice. The rebellion had failed and gone down; but the rebel army of Virginia and its commander had not failed Fighting sternly against the Inevitable—against the irrepressible tendencies, the generous aspirations of the age—they had been proved unable to succeed where success would have been a calamity to their children, to their country, and the human race. And when the transient agony of defeat had been endured and had passed, they all experienced a sense of relief as they crowded around their departing chief, who, with streaming eyes, grasped and pressed their outstretched hands, at length finding words to say, 'Men, we have fought through the war together. I have done the best that I could for you.' There were few dry eyes among those who witnessed the scene; and our soldiers hastened to divide their rations with their late enemies, now fellow-countrymen, to stay their hunger until provisions from our train could be drawn for them. Then while most of our army returned to Burkesville, and thence, a few days later, to Petersburg and Richmond, the work of paroling went on under the guardianship of Griffin's and Gibbon's infantry, with McKenzie's cavalry; and, so fast as paroled, the Confederates took their way severally to their respective homes, many of them supplied with transportation, as well as food, by the Government they had fought so long and so bravely to subject and destroy."

Last Words of Eminent Persons—Comprising in the majority of instances, a brief account of their Last Hours—Compiled by Joseph Kaines.

The following, from Jean Paul Richter, furnishes the keynote to this volume: "When in your last hour (think of this) all faculty in the broken spirit shall fade away and sink into insanity—imagination, thought, effort, enjoyment—then will the flowers of belief, which blossoms even in the night, remain to refresh you with its fragrance in the last darkness."

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

THERE is nothing strikingly new in our local fashions this week. Those who felt least inclined to adopt the headdress that takes the name of bonnet, have been obliged to bow to the dictum of fashion, and we can now see them in every form on our public streets. The newest style of glove has three buttons at the wrist, and is designed to take the place of the gauntlet.

The Peplum has found its way to our coast, and is considered the most stylish thing in the way of dress. It takes its name from its supposed resemblance to a garment of that name worn by the ladies of ancient Greece. In appearance it is like a semi-tight fitting sack with the skirt hollowed out back and front. This leaves long points at the sides; these points are open as far as the waist, and trimmed with fringe. Old-fashioned fringe—long, short, and medium-sized, with many new styles of the same—will figure on dresses, basques, and sacks this winter to the same extent that guipure does at present.

We have seen in an exchange a description of a very pretty costume that we will give our readers the benefit of. The dress and petticoat was of gray poplin, the dress-skirt made with a long train. Both petticoat and train was worked in a semi-gothic design, in heavy blue silk, in the Grover & Baker stitch. A tasselated cordelaire of blue silk looped the dress permanently on one side, and displayed the petticoat. The bodice was a tight-fitting basque with revers of blue silk opening over a plain chemisette. The tails to the basque sloped upwards on the hip, leaving a rounded point behind and in front. The sleeves tight to the arm, with a small blue silk cap. A broad belt of blue-corded silk completed this very elegant dress.

Although there is no present demand for ladies' "sporting costumes" in California, the following description of them by the Paris correspondent of the New York Herald may not prove uninteresting:

I must give your readers an account of the shooting and sporting costumes as I viewed them a few days ago in the fields and woodland round one of the most hospitable chateaux in France, and which will, till the end of October, be the rendezvous of all those who are, or who pretend to be, capable of shooting "a bit." This preteusion is also entertained by ladies, who, in these days of female emancipation, consider that the right they have acquired to wear jerkins and top boots entitles them just as well to "shoulder arms," "fire arms," etc. Some of the costumes ordered for the occasion I allude to were so very curious that, had I been a rabbit, I should have forgotten to run away in the enjoyment of a mental survey of the wearers thereof. I thought, as I looked at the whole party assemble before starting, on the terrace which runs round the chateau, that the game stood less chance of a deadly shot than the friendly guests themselves, who did not seem to stand in sufficient awe of each other's weapons. Some of the grandsons of Nimrod, disdaining substantial cloth and gaiters, had too much cotton velvet and of the Mousquetaire style about them. Others, despising aught but the legendary brown Holland suit, looked killing, fierce, and murderous, and were provided with bags, perhaps not big enough to contain a sultana, but certainly too spacious for all the winged and ground game they could kill. Their mustaches were twirled into long, stiff spikes; their nostrils expanded, and altogether they looked more blood-thirsty and snuffed much more air than the highbred pointers straining in leash behind them. These ferocious instincts were more subdued among the ladies, whose sex, as we have all been taught, is gentle. They paced up and down in tiny-footed high boots, and the favorite colors of their attire were russet-brown, emerald green, and ruby. Two of these shooting costumes, worn by very illustrious dames, deserve special record.

The emerald green was composed of a satin jerkin, cut out in five square basquines round the waist. It was close fitting, and fastened down the front with round gilt filigree buttons. The over-skirt was made of velvet, cut in battlement squares, on an under-skirt of emerald satin to match the jerkin.

The boots, gloves, gauntlets, and belt were fawn-colored. A small velvet cap and ostrich feather, fastened with a gilt fox, was jauntily placed on one side of the head; the chignon was confined in a gold-thread net.

The ruby-colored costume I cannot better describe than by calling it a "garde Francaise." It was composed of a velvet skirt and velvet jacket, with ruby satin facings called "revers" on the front and back basques. Chamois-leather boots, gloves and belt, a Highland velvet cap, in which stuck one pheasant feather, completed the costume. Most of the merry party thought that the best part of it was certainly the "getting up" process; but lookers-on with a taste for the ludicrous most enjoyed the field of action, when one of the fair sportswomen actually came across a hare. She took her time, deceived by the calm composure with which the nimble footed quadruped sat on its hind legs, insultingly brushing its whiskers. When at last the preliminaries had been gone through, the lock of the gun clicked, the lady closed her eyes and fired upwards! It may easily be supposed that every one was delighted at the way in which the whole affair went off, powder, shot, game, and all—especially the latter.

THE Marie-Antoinette Scarf has suggested to the fertile minds of modistes a pretty accessory to a dress for an evening party, namely: a scarf of light silk an inch or two deep, cut so as to fit perfectly across the shoulders, crossed on the breast and tied behind, the ends falling over the dress.

THE Boudoir says: "Cashmere sacks and basques bid fair to be as popular here this winter as they were in Paris last season They must be profusely ornamented with jet beads. The beads may dot them all over or form elaborate designs almost covering the whole garment. One recently came under our notice which was embroidered in a South American design—the face of a grotesque god surrounded with sun's rays; one on each front; a cluster of five on the back; and one on the outside half of each sleeve. Between the rays and the head proper it was difficult to tell of what material the garment was made."

THE most fashionable style for visiting cards is the thin, plain card; with the name and address engraved in small writing character. In the case of a young lady, it is always considered good taste to have her name placed on her mother's card, or on that of her chaperone, supposing her mother not to be living.

A CALIFORNIA FARM.—The Alameda County Gazette makes mention of a large farm in that county: "Duane & Threlfall sowed and harvested this year in Murray township 2,200 acres of grain, mostly wheat, and of good quality. Their regular harvest force is sixty men. They employ 137 horses and mules in regular service on their ranch, and have four eight-mule teams which haul 110 sacks each over the hills to the landing. This year they ran three headers, five reapers, and two threshers. They are preparing to sow the coming season 4,700 acres, 4,000 of which are inclosed in one field. The working force will be sufficient to plow, sow, and harrow eighty acres per day."

PERSONS wishing to visit FOUNTAIN FARM, the site of the PACIFIC HYGEIAN HOME, will find a conveyance in waiting at the depot of the Oakland Railroad. The Institution is conducted by regular graduates of the Hydropathic College of New York. B. J. Smith, M. D., Consulting Physician; R. S. Macbeth, M. D., Attending Physician; W. G. W. DURING the epidemic of intermittents in the West this season, the whole immense stock of AYER'S AGUE CURE became exhausted, and the producing power of his Laboratory was found inadequate to meet the demand. Many who knew its extraordinary virtues for the cure of CHILLS AND FEVER, paid exorbitant prices for it to those who were fortunate enough to have a supply on hand. Some of our neighbors paid ten dollars for a bottle, while the regular price is but one, and assure us it was on the whole the cheapest remedy they could buy, even at that figure. They praise it for two qualities first, that it cures; and last, that it leaves the health unimpaired.—Iowa Standard.

AMUSEMENTS.

AT Maguire's Opera House, charming little "Fanchon" Kingsbury continues to draw excellent houses—and overcrowded ones on the nights when The Cricket is played. Then it is that the public rush and crowd each other in their anxiety to drop their dollars in the treasurer's drawer, the pleasant chinks of which respond most cheerfully to the chirpings of the little "Cricket" within.

The Cricket on the Hearth, another play of the same charming family, will be produced on Monday night, and repeated on Friday. This afternoon, The Child of the Savanna will be performed, and this evening the Little Rag Picker. The management announce the programme of next week's performances in the advertisement elsewhere. Seats can now be secured at the box-office for any evening during the coming week.

METROPOLITAN.—At this theatre the Howson Troupe, assisted by Mrs. Julia Gould, Mrs. Hall, Mr. Leach, and others, produced Cinderella in a very creditable manner, with fine orchestral and chorus accompaniments, and really gave the public a very pleasant entertainment if they would only have had the sense to have gone and seen it. It is discreditable to our public taste and liberality that a troupe possessing so much merit as this should not be more adequately sustained. To be sure we have had a good deal of opera of late, but that fact can only serve as a partial excuse for the public's present indifference. Cinderella will be repeated for the matinée today. On Monday, Satanus and The Spirit of Beauty will be given—a new attraction, in which the young sisters of the troupe will probably fill all the requirements perfectly, as they possess its elements in a very eminent degree.

LEE & RYLAND'S HIPPODROME—after a most prosperous summer trip through California and Oregon—has returned to the city, and has pitched its mammoth tent on the ground sacred to sawdust and circuses, on Jackson street, between Montgomery and Kearny, where it will give its opening performance on Monday night. This company is a full and excellent one, with splendid horses, trained ponies and mules, and a commodious and well fitted up pavilion. Harry Jackson, whilome of the Opera House, holds that circus post of honor—the clown—and has been eminently successful in that capacity during the summer season in the interior. The performance will be changed nightly, and chariot and hurdle-racing, steeple-chasing, and trotting matches will also be introduced. After to-day they will give circus matinées every Saturday, expressly for the delight of the juvenile population.

DARBY AND THE RAM.

[THE following quaint sketch is from the Dublin Penny Journal, of nearly forty years ago. Some at least of our readers will appreciate its old-fashioned, homespun simplicity. We publish it as an instructive illustration of the progress of the revolution in literary taste that the last half century has witnessed.]

'TWAS one of those days when the sun in its perpendicular altitude looks at two sides of the hedge at once—a lovely midsummer day—when Nature was laughing till her sides ached, and mother Earth, in her gayest mood, was lavishing her promises and her smiles on her often ungrateful children; the lambs were skipping to and fro within their inclosed pastures, and the cows, with grave and matron aspect, were lolling in the sun, and ruminating their already gathered repast; everything seemed happy except the Shepherd Darby.

Poor fellow! A "green and yellow melancholy" had settled on his manly cheek; his grief he revealed not, but let "concealment, like a worm i' the bud," prey upon his spirits; he stalked about the field like a ghost, or leaned upon his crook in silent despair.

Lord Amplefield and Squire Buckthorn were riding past to dinner. "I wonder," said his lordship to the squire, "what can be the matter with my Shepherd Darby. He seems in a galloping consumption, and were I to lose him, I would not see his like again for many a long day. He is the most honest, steady, careful creature in the world, and never told a lie in his life."

"Never told a lie in his life! Good! Why, my lord, do you really believe such nonsense."

"Decidedly I do. I know your opinion is not very favorable as to the moral character of our dependents, yet there are some among them not unworthy of trust."

They now advanced nearer, and his lordship held up his whip as a signal, and over bounded Darby.

"Well, Darby, that shower we had last night served the pastures."

"It did, my lord, and the cows will give a larger meal, and require milking earlier this evening through means of it."

"Darby, bring over my favorite ram, that this gentleman may see it."

"Yes, my lord. Hallo 'Sweeper,' away for 'Ballface.'" In a few minutes the dog hunted the ram up from the flock. "That's a clever turn, my worthy," said the squire, "here's half a crown to drink."

"Thanks to your honor," said Darby, "but the worth of that in strong drink will serve me a year, and yet I'll spend it on drink all in one night."

"Explain this riddle, Darby."

"Why, sir, when I feel myself merry enough without it, where's the use in taking it? That stream can slake my thirst as well. Yet I'll not speak for others—many there are who must have strong drink to give them false spirits. On them will I spend it to open their hearts, and make them forget their day's toil."

"You are a worthy fellow, and a philosopher," said Lord Amplefield, with a look of triumph, as he and the squire rode off.

"What say you to my shepherd, now?"

"A mighty plausible fellow, indeed! Yet proud as you are of him, my lord. I bet a score of sheep that before two days I'll make him tell you a barefaced lie, out and out."

"Done!" said his lordship: the wager was laid, and the squire set out on his lie-making expedition.

He soon ascertained the cause of Darby's melancholy. There had been a quarrel between him and the girl of his heart—the lovely Cauthleen. Pride prevented a reconciliation, though both would have given the world to be in each other's arms. To her the squire bent his steps, succeeded in drawing out the secret that she loved Darby with a heart and a half, and then artfully upbraiding her with unkindness in neglecting the "worthy young fellow," contrived to inveigle her, by a series of falsehoods, into a plan to get reconciled to Darby, and while in the height of his happiness, to coax the ram from him. It succeeded next day to admiration; and the laughing girl tripped home, leading the animal with a kerchief taken from her snowy bosom.

Darby was now left to solitary reflection. The hour was rapidly approaching when his lordship usually took his round, and he would infallibly miss his favorite ram. What was to be done? To tell a lie appeared to his honest mind the very essence of degradation—to equivocate was meanness execrable: yet an excuse must be had! A sudden thought seized him; he resolved to see how a lie would look before he told it; and planting his crook in the field, and placing his hat on it—in order to personate himself—he retired to a little distance, and, in the character of his lordship, hailed the effigy as follows:

"Good morrow, Darby."

"Good morrow, my lord."

"How are the flocks to-day, Darby?"

"Pretty fair, my lord."

"Darby, I don't see my favorite ram. Where is he?"

"O, my lord, he—he—he—"

"He what, Darby?"

"He was drownd-ed—my—my lord!"

"Darby, if I did not know your general character for carefulness, I should be exceedingly annoyed; but I presume it was an accident. Send the fat and hide up to the castle."

"That won't do!" murmured Darby, slowly turning away. He resolved to try again.

"Good morrow, Darby."

"Good morrow, my lord."

"Are the flocks well to-day, Darby?"

"Bravely, my lord."

"And my ram, Darby, where is he?"

"My lord, he—he—"

"Is there anything wrong? tell me at once."

"He was sto—len, my—lord."

"Stolen! stolen! I saw him this morning as I was riding past! When was he stolen?"

"That won't do either!" exclaimed the poor shepherd, as he turned away the second time. "Cruel, cruel Cauth!"

Something seemed to whisper to him, "Try if perhaps the truth will do!" Fresh courage animated his desponding mind, and wheeling about, he recommenced the colloquy, and, on coming to the usual interrogation, "Where's the ram," he dropped on his knees, and exclaimed, "O, my lord, I had a falling out with my sweetheart, and she would not make it up with me unless I made her a present of your lordship's favorite ram. Discharge me, my lord; do with me what you please, but I could not bring myself to tell your lordship a lie!"

"That will do!" shouted Darby, springing from his knees, and walking up and down with a feeling of honest exultation. He had scarcely time to compose himself when his lordship and the squire appeared. Darby, on the usual interrogation being put, dropped on his knees, and told "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth;" and instead of seeing a frown gathering upon his lordship's countenance, he beheld him turn with a look of triumph towards the squire, while he exclaimed,

"An honest man's the noblest work of God!"

The squire's forfeited sheep were given to Cauthleen as a dower, and in taking the hand of her shepherd, she promised never again to put his truth and constancy to so severe a trial.

"ECCE HOMO."—The latest guess about the author of Ecce Homo is, that it is from the pen of Mr. Richard Holt Hutton, a distinguished journalist.

BUTTER.

THERE are occasions in our lives when most of us have had to administer butter, and to administer it more or less unsparingly, and the art of buttering is accordingly an art which it is well worth the while of all of us to study. Butter is of various kinds, and the different kinds ought to be kept quite distinct, and each sort requires its own special manipulation. There is the marriage-breakfast butter, and the after-dinner butter, and the funeral butter. The first of the three does not demand any genius of a high order. Every one knows, when a young lady is married, that some one has got to dilate on the virtues of the bridegroom and the beauties of the bride; and even if both are limited, there is always a family fogy who can be brought to drink himself over afternoon champagne into a species of maudlin admiration of matrimony in general, and of the young couple who are performing in particular, and who is ready to assert, from a long and intimate knowledge of both parties, that Augustus Brown is the one fortunate being who deserves to be trusted by heaven with the happiness and destiny of Sophonisba Smith.

Funeral butter is a little more difficult to manage. The duty of erecting oratorical tombstones to the departed requires tact and judgment, and is not usually confided to a casual speaker. There is something historical about the affair, and spectators like to see the customary honors done well, and with judgment.

An after-dinner panegyric is the hardest of the three labors. When a man is married, sympathy is easily commanded; and when a man dies, every one is pleased to think that the most is to be made of all his valuable points, for no one, as Pericles tells us, is jealous or envious of the dead. Sentiment a tsuch times comes in and helps the orator considerably, and few are keen to mark the defects of the panegyrist who praises either dead people or matrimonial turtle-doves above their exact deserts. But an after-dinner puff is exposed to a very different ordeal. To be sure it is always pleasant and delightful to have plenty of butter going on such occasions, and few things contribute more to the comfort and satisfaction of the evening than the application of universal butter to every one. And one of the reasons why the manufacture of butter is so thoroughly agreeable is that, in buttering others, one always has an opportunity of slily buttering oneself. As a rule, men approve most vociferously of those qualities which they wish to be considered to possess. Butter of this description has a professional savor about it which excites a passing suspicion in the mind. It tastes of the firkin a little too much to be perfectly pleasant. Then, again, it will be read by jealous and critical eyes next morning. Speeches look very poorly over the tea-urn which are pronounced over the bottle, and no one cares to endorse about his neighbor all the lavish encomium that has been bestowed on him overnight by sympathetic topers. The butter spread on after-dinner toasts is therefore a subject on which too much attention never can be spent, as there are but few great masters of the art of after-dinner buttering.—London Saturday Review.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No 4.

"MEDICINE CHESTS always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

THE great Physiologist, MAGENDIE, has written: "The end of all our efforts should be to study the causes of disease, and not their effects, as has long been done. The physician mixes, combines, and jumbles together vegetable, minerat, and animal substances, and administers them, right or wrong, without considering for a moment the cause of the disease, and without a single clear idea as to his conduct. I hesitate not to declare, no matter how sorely I shall wound our vanity, that, so great is our ignorance of the real nature of the physiological disorders called diseases, that it would perhaps be better to do nothing, and resign the complaint we are called to treat to the resources of Nature, than to act as we are frequently compelled to do, without knowing the why or wherefore of our conduct, and at the obvious risk of hastening the end of our patient." And again "It is not a little remarkable that, at a period when the positive is sought in every quarter, the study of a science so important to humanity as medicine should be almost the only one characterized by uncertainty and chance." Such being the sentiments of so distinguished a savan as MAGENDIE, responded to also by many others of the highest attainments in medicine, and accompanied by the almost universal distrust and contempt for medical practice entertained by the people, is it surprising, amid so much that is chaotic, that they should be Bryantized, or smart under the recollection of the filthy messes they swallowed at the command of Chinese impostors, the creatures of their own folly?

DR. BOURNE'S BATHS.—A live institution for the benefit of the sick, and those also who wish to keep well, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

THE secret of health is, a clean skin, pure air, pure food and plenty of it; a sound stomach, and to know how to employ it advantageously; proper exercise, clothing, habits, etc. etc. All these things DR. BOURNE, 10 Masonic Temple, Post street, has been sedulously teaching in San Francisco during more than fourteen years.

TO PURIFY THE BLOOD—to cleanse and render the skin active—to equalize the circulation of the blood and nervous forces—in fact, to reinvigorate the whole human frame, there is nothing like DR. BOURNE'S BATHS, at No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

THE BURGLARY AT FAUSTEL EVERSLEIGH.

BY J. R. MEARNS.

"WELL, Biggs, what is the matter? You look important this morning."

Biggs swelled in majestic silence, deposited the muffin-dish on the table with as near an approach to emphasis as he dared, and was in the act of retreating, when the young lady standing at one of the open windows looked up from her newspaper to say,—

"Aunt Dora, these burglaries are becoming quite alarming; they are travelling in our direction, I think, too: there was one at Woodthorpe only three nights ago—close to us, you know—"

The temptation to cap this piece of news quite overcame Mr. Biggs' wounded dignity, and he opened his lips and spoke.

"And one, Miss Lucy, at Willow Lodge last night, for the postman brought the news this morning with the letters."

"Dear, dear!" said Mrs. Selwyn. "I hope poor Miss Jenkins and Miss Araminta came to no harm."

"The family, ma'am, was not molested," answered Biggs, with solemnity; "but everything the villains could lay hands on was carried off, and no traces of them hasn't been discovered up to the present moment!"

"Really, Aunt Dora, it is serious. You know we are two lone women as well as Miss Jenkins and her sister. Suppose they take a fancy to visit us next?"

"Well, Lucy, I will have all the plate packed up to-day and sent in a most ostentatious manner to my bankers. And I'll tell you what I can do as well, if that is not precaution enough. You remember Jack Eversleigh? he is at home now on leave, and I'll write him a line to come down here for a week or two, with his "long sword," revolvers, and all his "bold dragoon" paraphernalia, and mount guard over two unprotected females. It will be quite in Jack's way, or would have been once upon a time. You have not forgotten Jack?"

"I don't remember him very well," answered Miss Lucy, bestowing a good deal of attention on her breakfast-cup. "Hasn't he turned out very wild? Mary Selden told me something of that sort, I think."

"'Give a dog a bad name, and hang him,' my dear. It has always been the fashion in Jack's family to give the lad that credit. I don't know exactly what amount, or what kind of iniquity is comprehended in the word 'wild'; it is certain Jack has always been called a scapegrace; it is equally certain that I believe a truer gentleman or kinder heart does not bear her Majesty's commission to-day!" Mrs. Selwyn's eyes sparkled, and her fair old cheek colored, as she spoke. Childless herself, she was very fond of her late husband's favorite nephew, John Eversleigh, and had fought on the lad's side in many a pitched battle with prim aunts and austere father. Lucy Gresham would have liked to believe that Jack Eversleigh was no worse than Aunt Dora thought him. Mary Selden had said he was "wild," and George Selden, who ought surely to know, being in the same regiment, had talked of Jack's being always "hard up," whatever that might mean, and so-and-so—and Lucy sighed: she would have preferred to think her old playfellow was not utterly reprobate, if she had been able.

It was very hard to look at him, and yet hold to that opinion, Lucy was thinking, a day or two afterwards, as she sat demurely silent near one of the windows, and listened to the merry talk that was going on between Mrs. Selwyn and Captain Eversleigh, newly arrived. Jack seemed mightily amused and interested on hearing in what capacity he was invited, and on the whole impressed Miss Gresham with the conviction that he would be rather disappointed if no burglar afforded him any means of exercising his predilection for strife and violence during his stay.

With these thoughts in her mind, it is not wonderful that Lucy's manner towards the object of them was shy and constrained to the last degree. Haughty or repellant she could not be, nature not having provided her with that double-edged weapon called "a spirit," but only a gentle heart, that would fain have had kind and loving thoughts of all the world, and believe the best of every man, woman, or child with whom she came into contact. In theory, you see, poor Lucy had shaken her head and sighed over the iniquity of the world at large; but in practice, it was her feminine habit to take those with whom she came into actual contact much as they appeared, or professed themselves to be—not seldom, indeed, in her innocent and tender imaginings crediting them with virtues which I am afraid they had no claim to, out of that gentle region.

And the shyness and constraint did not deter Jack in the least from setting himself to restore, at the very first opportunity, something of the old familiar relations between himself and his little companion of long ago. He thought them both rather pretty than otherwise: but by that time Mr. Jack had privately arrived at the conviction, too, that Miss Gresham possessed the largest, softest, most innocent eyes, and the loveliest wild rose complexion, he had ever seen.

Fashionable girls, fast girls, flirting girls, merry, outspoken, frank girls, Jack knew by scores, and had very likely waltzed, hunted, and talked nonsense by the mile, to very nearly the same number; a little tender, unsophisticated, ignorant girl, who shook her head at the opera, balls, and cigar-smoking generally, and yet who cried real, heartfelt tears over the capture of that incorrigible poacher and vagabond, Dowdy Dick, was something new and piquant; and, accordingly, he set himself to the task of cultivating amicable relations with Lucy Gresham, with a characteristic inability to admit the idea of failure, that must needs have gone far to insure success, even if Lucy had been other than she was.

Being what she was, it is not wonderful that after only two or three day's experience of Jack's pleasant qualities as a companion, in the quiet home-life of the old manor house, Lucy had gone so far as to think that a gentleman might hunt and even smoke without being utterly reprobate; and that whatever might be comprehended in the vague term of being "hard up," it could not be anything very bad, and yet applied with truth to John Eversleigh.

Simple faith of a guileless little heart! only it was a pity, you see, that it should have been so founded very much on the fact of Jack's having handsome dark eyes and a pleasant smile that was always ready.

And in that companionship the days seemed to glide away like dreams, happy dreams, all too fleet in the passing. Ah! those long, sauntering walks through bright summer days; those rides over breezy downs, among sweet green lanes and shadowy woodland paths, where wood-doves cooed in the happy silence, and squirrels scrambled higher among the scented pines, to look down with bright inquisitive eyes upon the sleek horses and their riders, as they wound along the slender pathway, with gentle footfalls all muffled and made tranquil by the last year's leaves that lay so thickly there. Ah days happy in the coming—in the passing—and yet destined to bear such a cruel sting when memory of them was all that was left!

As to the burglars, for whose expected incursions Captain Eversleigh's visit had been a preparation, I am inclined to think that remembrance of them retreated very much into the background, though, for the first night or two, Jack diligently made tremendous and complicated arrangements for their reception in the way of revolvers, life-preservers, etc., etc., Stout-hearted old Mrs. Selwyn had never entertained any fears; Lucy somehow forgot hers in pleasanter things; and when, one night, just before retiring to bed, Aunt Dora produced from her pocket-book a packet of bank-notes, making an amount of nearly two hundred pounds, which she had received that day, and had delayed, for some reason or other, driving over to Marley to pay in to her bankers, it was only Jack who looked somewhat grave over the imprudence.

"It's what Biggs would call a downright tempting of Providence, Aunt Dolly," he said, in concluding his remonstrance.

"Biggs is such an arrant coward that, I declare, if I could see my way to getting up an impromptu burglary for his sole benefit, I'm perfectly sure I should not be able to resist the temptation," remarked the old lady, as she put away the notes in a little cabinet of Japanese workmanship, of which the key was duly taken out and deposited, for security, with true feminine ideas of the same, under the family Bible which lay on its carved oaken stand in a recess.

The sun was streaming brightly upon Lucy's closed eyes the next morning, when she opened them with a start to find Aunt Dora standing by her bedside, looking a little disturbed and much graver than her pleasant wont.

"My coming in did not wake you, Lucy," she said; "so I suppose it is not to be expected that you should have heard anything of what took place last night, which was what I came to ask you."

"Took place last night, Aunt Dora!" repeated Lucy, starting up. "Why, why—what were you going to say?"

"Only that it seems the house was really broken into last night, and the notes I left in the Japan cabinet in the tent-room taken, after all. Jack is half wild to think that he should have played the watch-dog so inefficiently. He never heard a sound, he says, and they must have passed his door, as well as yours. But, Lucy, my child, don't look so terribly white and scared! No one was harmed, or even alarmed.

"Are you sure the money is gone? O, Aunt Dora! perhaps it's a mistake—a joke!" said Lucy, breathlessly, and with an inconsequence that made Mrs. Selwyn look a little impatient.

"I cannot perceive the joke of losing nearly two hundred pounds; and, as for mistake, the money has been carried off, that's very certain. When Biggs came up stairs this morning, he found the window in the little vestibule wide open. He told Martha, who came to me, and I went straight to the tent-room, and found the cabinet wide open and the money gone. It had been opened with the key, too, for that was in the lock. And you never heard anything, Lucy?"

"Something woke me once—but what does Captain Eversleigh say?—what does he think?"

"Say?—why, that I ought not to have kept the money in the house; and as for his thoughts, he has ridden over to Marley post-haste to share them with the police. There, Lucy, I am sorry to have frightened the blood out of your cheeks; make haste with your toilet and come to breakfast, my dear—you look as if you wanted it, and we'll not wait for Jack."

But half an hour afterwards Lucy carried the same shocked white face into the breakfast-parlor with which she had listened to these tidings; and though Mrs. Selwyn laughed, and said that the occasion was not worth anything so tragic, somehow that look never faded out of Lucy's face, but seemed to deepen as the day wore on.

Then ensued days of unwonted stir and bustle at quiet old Faustel Eversleigh; a great coming and going of members of the police force from Marley; much communing with the same on the part of Captain Eversleigh, who entered into the search for traces of the thieves with a great deal of energy and spirit; and a perfect influx of visitors to sympathize and condole. Energy and spirit were expended in vain, however, as far as the desired purpose was concerned. There was absolutely no clue, as it seemed; and when two or three days had gone over, and wary detectives had prowled and poked over every corner of the old house, inside and out—had asked numberless questions of every member of the household, they seemed as far off as ever.

Mrs. Selwyn declared she would rather lose the same amount of money three times told, than go to the same fuss and bother to recover it; implored her nephew to let the search drop, and take no further steps in the matter; which Captain Eversleigh was, perforce, obliged to do, very unwillingly, as he said, "seeing that his leave was within a day or two of its expiry, and he must deprive his aunt of his presence just at the very time he should have liked to think himself wanted."

There was a soft undertone in Jack's voice when he made this remark, and he glanced as he spoke towards that silent figure, sitting in the farthest of the deep old windows, with the gentle evening light falling softly on its bending head. Amidst all the bustle and occupation of the last few days, Jack had not forgotten to notice how pale and silent Lucy Gresham had been, nor how the innocent brown eyes had worn a scared and bewildered look very foreign to their usual tranquil tenderness.

"It was natural enough, that—she was such a gentle, tender little thing—not a bit stout-hearted, nor strong-minded, (none the less charming for the want, though,) and, of course, her nerves had been shaken by what had happened."

Captain Eversleigh was thinking something like this, as he walked over towards the window where Lucy had sat silent so long, meaning, when he reached her, to say something like this, as he walked over towards the window where Lucy had sat silent so long, meaning, when he reached her, to say something soothing and sympathizing only, startled and confounded by the look that Lucy turned upon him for an instant, as he did so, that he drew back involuntarily with—

"For Heaven's sake! what can be the matter, Lucy?"

There was no answer: she had turned her face away again still more closely to the window, so that it was quite hidden; but he saw instead the strong tension of the clasp in which the hands lying in her lap were pressed together. Jack was very much amazed, but he was very much moved, too. He threw a hasty glance over his shoulder to where Aunt Dora was reclining in her lounging chair, her back conveniently towards them, then stooped down very nearly to that averted face, while he said—almost as tenderly as he felt at the instant—

"Tell me what is wrong, Lucy. Ah! if you only knew—"

But that beginning was destined to remain uncompleted; for Lucy Gresham suddenly rose out of her seat, upright as a dart, white as a ghost, serene and sad as an accusing angel.

"If I knew! I do know. And now that you know I do, never, never speak to me again—for that I cannot bear, and be silent!" And before Captain Eversleigh could recover from his pause of petrified astonishment, Miss Gresham turned her back on him and fled from the room.

She did not appear at breakfast the next morning—the last breakfast that Jack Eversleigh would partake of for some time to come under Aunt Dora's roof. Lucy had a headache, Mrs. Selwyn explained, and begged to be excused; which intelligence Jack heard without remark, and was altogether, during the progress of the meal, so absent and unlike himself, that Aunt Dora was privately imagining that there was a reason why he should be more sorry to say "good bye" to Faustel Eversleigh this time than had existed on former occasions.

"Well, well," thought the kind old lady, "and if Jack and Lucy have taken a fancy to one another, I don't know that either could do better; and, for my part, I think I would ask nothing better than that the children should marry and settle down here with me, as long as I live. I have always liked to think of Jack's having the old place when I am gone, and Lucy would make the dearest little wife in the world. I do think that Jack is smitten; and she—well, well—"

And while the old lady was dreaming of love and marriage, and dark old houses growing all humanly warm and bright in the light of the sweet story that was first told in Eden, Captain Eversleigh was indignantly intent upon these two questions:

"What the deuce could Lucy Gresham mean? What the deuce does she know?"

There was no opportunity of propounding them to Miss Gresham herself, supposing that Captain Eversleigh desired it; for, up to the last minute of his stay, no Lucy was visible. So his farewells had only to be made to Aunt Dora when the time arrived. They were very hearty and affectionate, like the feeling that subsisted between the two; and when Mrs. Selwyn turned in again from the portico where she had stood to see Jack drive off, she felt as if the silent house had lost something that made it a pleasant home, in that cheerful, manly presence. It had lost something else, too, as it very soon appeared; for the pale, silent Lucy of the days and weeks succeeding Captain Eversleigh's departure was as unlike the cheerful little maiden of days gone, as anything that could well be imagined.

As to the lost money and the suspected burglary, that seemed a subject tabooed by both ladies with mutual consent, though not so readily allowed to drop by chance visitors, with whom a topic of conversation during the orthodox twenty minutes was too precious to be parted with lightly.

"Dear me!" said a lady, one morning, after the circumstances of the robbery had been succinctly detailed to her by Mrs. Selwyn, in answer to her questions. "Did it never occur to you to suspect any one in the house, my dear Mrs. Selwyn?"

"Not to me, certainly," answered Mrs. Selwyn, with a disturbed glance over at Lucy, who had made a sudden start in her chair; "for I have no servant, fortunately, whose trustworthiness has not been proved."

"This is fortunate indeed—for them," returned the lady; but, really, I think I should not be very easy myself, under the circumstances. Does it not strike you as suspicious, for instance, that nothing but the money should have been taken, or that the thief should have known so exactly where to put his hand upon it?"

"I don't think I should have thought so myself," answered the old lady, looking very fidgety; "but then I knew there was really little but the money to take. I had sent all the plate we don't use to my bankers some time before, and, after my nephew came down, Biggs always carried the rest into his room every night. As for the fact of the thieves knowing where to find the money, there was nothing very wonderful about that; no doubt the house had been watched; and, as we all remembered afterwards, the windows of the room from which it was taken were wide open, and the lights burning, when I locked it into the cabinet. From that clump of rhododendrons yonder, every movement of those in the room could have been seen perfectly well."

"Ah! true; well, it is very pleasant to have such confidence in those about us. And when may we hope to see Captain Eversleigh again?"

"He writes me that there is some chance of his being quartered with a detachment at Marley for a while—a piece of very unhoped for good news."

The conversation changed; but when the visitor had been gone some minutes, Mrs. Selwyn broke the silence that had lasted since then by saying—

"I am sorry that you should have heard Mrs. Sandell's charitable surmises. Lucy dear, Jack begged me not to let you know that such an idea had ever been started. He thought that, being such a timid little thing, it would only add to your uneasiness, perhaps."

"Who first entertained such an idea?" inquired Lucy, faintly.

"The detective who came over first suggested it, I think, to Jack, who imparted it to me; but of course I could not entertain it for a moment. Biggs certainly knew I had the money in the house; but, surely, the fidelity for twenty years—"

Mrs. Selwyn paused a little absently, and Lucy's voice broke passionately into the silence:

"O, Aunt Dora! don't suspect any one! least of all, poor, good old Biggs! He never took the money! never! never! Captain Eversleigh must be sure of that; and O, surely he would never let you think so for one instant; it would be too cruel—too wicked!"

"Why, Lucy!" said Mrs. Selwyn, looking at the girl's flushed face in some wonder. "Biggs ought to be very much obliged to you for your championship, only it is a pity there should be no more call for it. As for Jack's entertaining such a suspicion, he pooh poohed it from the very first; so there is no occasion for all that indignation, my dear. I am not vindictive, I hope," Mrs. Selwyn went on, after a little pause, "but I would give the money over again to have the real thief brought to light; there is something so painful in the atmosphere of doubt and suspicion that surrounds an undiscovered crime. Don't let us talk any more of it, Lucy; we have been wise in ignoring it hitherto."

Lucy arose, put on her hat and mantle, and taking her solitary way out into the grounds, wandered to a spot at some distance from the house, where a pretty little brown river stole through banks all picturesquely broken and rugged, singing as it went, with a happy music to which the girl had unconsciously set dreams as gentle and glad, many and many a time in the bright summer days that were gone. Thoughts of them came back to her now, perhaps, all strangely and sadly mingled with the altered present; and throwing her arms forward against the moss-grown trunk of one of the old trees bending over the little river, Lucy hid her face upon them and wept passionate, despairing tears, never known before by those gentle eyes.

"What ought I to do? What is right? What is best?" she thought, with that dreadful, agonizing struggle to reconcile duty and expediency that is apt to beset those whose conscience is so tender, and whose heart so gentle as poor Lucy's. "It would break Aunt Dora's heart if it came to light; and mine is breaking now, I think. What shall I do?"

But no answer came to that sad, appealing cry; the wind sighed among the trees overhead, and the leaves came shivering down at the sound, and were borne silently away on the brown water, for it was summer no longer; and never, surely, was autumn so cheerless before, Lucy thought. But joy and sadness are in the eyes which look and the ears which listen, and the fairest sunshine would have been clouded just now to Lucy Gresham's.

In fact, Lucy's eyes had seen nothing very clearly since that night, now many weeks ago, when the bank notes were stolen from the Japanese cabinet in the tent-room; or, at least, everything since then was distorted in the light of the utterly confounding sight they had witnessed on that occasion.

It was all before her now as she sat with hidden face and hands clasped before her eyes, for whether poor Lucy shut her eyes or opened them, they only seemed to serve her as long as she looked at one thing.

Yes; it was all before her now. How, on that horrible night, she had started from a light sleep and a happy dream, to listen breathlessly to a sound in the corridor outside her door—a quiet, muffled footfall passing stealthily along, and dying away in the distance. How, when it had quite gone—had been gone minutes indeed—she had sprung from her bed, in fear that lent her for the instant all the hardihood of courage, intending to fly into Aunt Dora's room; and how, as she opened the door, she saw with her own eyes—ah, heaven! yes—in the broad summer moonlight that lit up all the corridor from end to end with its solemn splendor, John Eversleigh—kind Aunt Dora's dearly-loved nephew—coming out of the tent-room with the little fanciful ivory-clasped box that held the bank-notes in his hand! How, in the wonder, the terror, the incredulity with which she looked on this sight, she had shrunk back into the room, and had listened to that muffled footfall coming quietly back past her door, past Aunt Dora's, till it died away again out of the corridor. Then the poor child had crept back into her bed, had turned her face down upon the pillow so as to shut out the fair moonlight, and repeated over and over again, with a piteous persistence in the words. "I have been dreaming; it was a dream—nothing so horrible could be true!" trying so to stifle thought and drown conviction, till suddenly she raised her head, joyful, trembling, melted to thankful tears, in the light of the blessed inspiration that suddenly flashed upon her mind. "It was a joke!—a practical joke—this abduction of the bank-notes—done just to give Aunt Dora a little fright and a little warning! How foolish not to have guessed that at once! Of course the money would be restored, and confession made the next morning, when Aunt Dora had been thoroughly well frightened." In the tremulous thankfulness of this relief, Lucy sank into the sleep from which Aunt Dora had wakened her that morning.

How poor Lucy's hope that "it was all a joke" had fluctuated through the after proceedings, and had finally faded away altogether, would have been a pitiful thing to see, if any one could have had a clue by which to trace it! Now, she had almost forgotten that the cloud which had enshrouded her since that night had ever been temporarily lightened by that idea. Ah, no! everything was wretched!—the world a miserable place, people inconceivably wicked, and those happiest and best off who had been laid to rest once for all under the churchyard daisies. Poor little Lucy! This, her first practical encounter with absolute, outcrying evil, had done the work of years, as indeed it always does on natures so tender and innocent.

She rose up now, after a while, and walked slowly homewards; so slowly that it was dark when she reached the house, and quite dark in the drawing-room when she opened the door and entered quietly.

As she did so, the familiar tones of a rich, manly voice reached her, that she would have known among hundreds, and that she redognized now with a great bound of the heart.

Yes; there, surely enough, standing in the full blaze of the firelight, was Jack Eversleigh, laughing and chatting with Aunt Dora as if there were no such things as care, or trouble, or wrong-doing in all this work-a-day world. He stopped short, though, as the door opened and Lucy entered, coming forward the next minute, with, perhaps, ever so little constraint in his manner as he held out his hand. Lucy half extended hers; but ah, no! her hand must never lie in that large cordial grasp again! She drew it back, and, bowing low, Jack turned easily away to his former place, and resumed his talk, while Lucy sank down trembling into a seat where the shadows gathered most thickly, and almost hid her from view.

Aunt Dora was certainly in the best of moods and spirits (she was auguring favorably for the success of her pet plan and the happiness of Lucy, you see, in this sudden reappearance of Jack Eversleigh), and as for her nephew, his momentary embarrassment had left no palpable traces behind.

"How can he laugh? How can he talk so lightly as he does?" thought the poor child, cowering among the shadows, with a kind of sorrowful, indignant wonder. "How dare he come here? Is it possible that he did not understand me?—that I did not speak plainly enough?"

She hid her face, and shrank down still more closely in her corner. And still the merry talk and laughter went on by the fireplace.

"Apropos of scrapes, Jack," Mrs. Selwyn said, presently, "how long is it since you walked into one in your sleep?"

Jack Eversleigh laughed, and colored a little.

"O, ever so many years, now—so many, that I hope that propensity and I have parted company for good and all. It used to cause me no end of bother, though, at one time. You remember the—"

And here Captain Eversleigh broke off, to stare in boundless surprise at the little figure starting from that dark corner, with clasped hands, and eager, pallid face.

"A sleep-walker! Do you walk in your sleep? O, if it were possible that—Aunt Dora—the bank-notes!—the money that was taken!" cried out poor Lucy, breathless, and shaking in every limb.

"The bank-notes, Lucy!—what an idea! Certainly, Jack had a queer habit of walking in his sleep, and doing strange things in a state of somnolency; but I don't suppose—"

"But I saw him, Aunt Dora!—I saw him! O, if I had only known—only guessed! I am so happy—so very, very thankful!" And here Lucy sank down in a burst of tears, that came fresh from her very heart.

"You saw me!" repeated the young man, looking from Aunt Dora to that crouching, weeping little figure, with an expression of bewilderment; "why did you not say so, then, and save all the bother?"

"I thought you knew what you were doing, and meant to do it. How could I know?" sobbed Lucy.

"Thought that I deliberately, and of my own will, possessed myself of money that did not belong to me!" said Jack, with involuntary haughtiness. But the next instant his sense of the ridiculous overpowered him, and he burst into a laugh so hearty and prolonged that Aunt Dora joined in it, till the tears streamed down her face; and even poor Lucy was fain to echo it, at the dire and imminent risk of becoming hysterical.

"Poor, dear Lucy!" said Mrs. Selwyn, presently, between her gasps for breath; "so you have really been thinking that Jack played the part of burglar that night. My poor child! There, I will not laugh any more, if I can help it; but, for heaven's sake, tell us all about it, for I own I don't see the thing quite clearly yet."

And so the whole story had to be gone over, or rather dragged into light by questions; for now, such deep, overpowering shame beset Lucy—such a keen perception of the fact that John Eversleigh must of necessity and forevermore hold her in abhorrence—that she was wellnigh speechless.

And Jack, being really a chivalrous and generous-hearted fellow, seeing all the pain and shame in the poor little face, and desirous of sparing it to the uttermost, suppressed whatever feeling he might have had in the matter, after that one involuntary burst, and listened, with good-natured amusement, to the relation of his own exploit.

"I wish you could enlighten me as to what I did with the money, for, on my word, I have never set waking eyes on it. At least, I remember now thinking that it would be a good joke to improvise a burglary, just for Aunt Dora's amusement (you suggested the idea yourself, ma'am, please to recollect); but what on earth became of the money? Did I go straight back into my room, I wonder?"

"No; down stairs, I think," said Lucy, faintly.

"The open window in the vestibule, Jack; how is that to be accounted for? Ah! I have it. Do you remember the little summer-house on the other side of the shrubbery? There's a sliding panel that conceals a recess in it, and many a time you have hidden my keys and work-bag there, when you were a boy. Jack, I will wager half the money that you put it there!"

Which, on examination, turned out to be the case. There lay the little ivory-clasped box, containing the roll of the bank-notes, never touched since Mrs. Selwyn's hand had placed them in it; and so the mystery of the "Burglary at Faustel Eversleigh" was a mystery no longer; though in years to come it became a story that Aunt Dora was never tired of telling to the little bright-eyed listeners round her chair, who called the hero and heroine "papa" and "mamma."—London Society.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 3. 1866.

TRAVELLING AGENT.—MR. O. P. TRUESDELL is our authorized Agent to receive subscriptions, and appoint agencies for THE CALIFORNIAN.

MR. JOHN C. ROBINSON is authorized to act as Agent for THE CALIFORNIAN.

DR. W. F. BRANDRETH is requested to call at this office.

BLACK SHEEP.—A story by Edmund Yates, from Charles Dickens' Magazine, with summary of portions already published, is continued in to-day's CALIFORNIAN.

THE RELIGION OF "INFINITE DUST."

WHEN the German naturalist, M. Charles Vogt, expanded the dictum of Cabanis, "Thought is a secretion of the brain," into the declaration that "there is the same relation between thought and the brain, as between bile and the liver, between urine and the loins," and became thereupon suddenly celebrated, he gave the most characteristic and striking expression possible in a popular form to the whole doctrine of materialism. Moleschott's "Without phosphorus no thought," and Buchner's "No force without matter; no matter without force," though not as easily controverted as Vogt's rash and undiscriminating statement, (in which a vital power is compared to refuse matter that the body throws off after having used it,) were also less vivid, and therefore less calculated to impress the popular mind.

And it is not to be denied that this new form of an old faith, the object of which a recent French writer refers to as a je ne sais quoi, nameless in any language, and that might be described as Infinite Dust, has, during the past few years, been making immense progress, not only among men of science, but also with the masses of the people; and more particularly is this the case in Germany, where Dr. Buchner's Kraft und Stoff—which is a complete hand-book of the new materialism—has been far more widely read than the famous Vestiges of Creation has been in England and the United States.

That there is no such thing as mind, as distinct from matter; that there has never been such an event as Creation, matter being eternal and self-existent; that, while matter never perishes, it is forever changing its forms, in an endless circle of dissolution and re-combination; that every individual form, animate or inanimate, as it has a beginning, has also an end; that individual existence consequently terminates when physical dissolution takes place; that the idea of any creative, supernatural power is repugnant to true science—these are some of the leading statements in the Infinite Dust creed

Presented in this brief, bald way, there seems little that is new or striking in this repulsive system—little, indeed, to distinguish it from the oldest forms of atheism; but when expanded and illustrated by analogies drawn from every department of physical science, as it is by Dr. Buchner and his colaborers, it assumes quite another aspect, and presses its pretensions upon even the reluctant understanding with a formidable plausibility.

There is something pathetic, and possessing even an element of sad sublimity, in the spectacle of the human intellect thus pronouncing its own doom, analyzing itself to declare that it is but a handful of perishable dust. Yet for a class of minds this gloomy philosophy seems to possess a certain power of attraction, while there is another class who accept its conclusions not merely with resignation, but with a strange cheerfulness, as if they felt relieved rather than otherwise by getting rid of the idea of immortality.

Notwithstanding the immense progress that these ideas have made in Germany, so that one of their writers speaks of materialism as being "the religion of the common people," we have sure and abundant guarantics that this progress is delusive and temporary. We have such guaranties in the nature and constitution of the human mind, whatever that mind may be. The materialistic philosophers and scientists delude themselves singularly if they imagine that any amount of proofs of the kind they deal in can destroy the belief in the supernatural. That belief has a stronghold in human nature that never can be reached by argument. Man must and will have a religion of some kind. Individuals exceptionally constituted may accept annihilation with cheerful alacrity, but there is a terrible shrinking form such a consummation in the average normal mind, which would incline it even to such a religion as that of the spirit-rappers, if the choice had to be made between that and the new materialism. Indeed, the prospects of the former system seem at present much more promising than those of the latter.

The great reason (regarding the subject from a purely philosophical point of view) for believing that religion, embracing at least three articles of faith—a God, Immortality, and the validity of moral distinctions—will endure as long as the race, is to be found in the unquestionable fact that the human mind is so constituted as to incline naturally toward such a faith; and the further fact that the powers of the mind, and the limits of speculative thonght, are such that it is an actual philosophical impossibility to disprove supernaturalism. Arguments more or less convincing may be accumulated indefinitely, but they never can amount to demonstration. Such books as Dr. Buchner's, able and powerful as it undoubtedly is, can only make materialists of those who are by their intellectual constitution inclined to materialism. Its arguments fail even to make any legitimate demand upon the belief of the idealist, and cannot change him. In short, regarded from a merely logical and philosophic point of view, the fundamental arguments both of the idealist and of the materialist Doctors fall short of strict proof; they are merely probable arguments. And this must forever be so; they may increase in number, may be newly stated and illustrated, but they cannot amount to that kind of proof which compels the assent of all reasonable men. Intellects of equal force, and equally trained and furnished, are to be found arrayed on different sides with an equal energy of conviction. The argument may go on forever, without producing a change of this conviction, until a new species of logic is discovered which is capable of changing a man's mental and moral constitution. Hence, in Belief and Unbelief, there is and must be an element that is not an intellectual one—an element of choice. But as the vast majority of men are naturally idealists, and as sentiment is a part of the general mental constitution, the Believers will always remain in the ascendant, and the Religion of Infinite Dust will never become the religion of the world.

CALIFORNIA FLY-GOBBLERS.

NATURAL history is pretty well represented in California, in one shape or another. Nothing is precisely like its corresponding species on the other side. This is true of our salmon, quail, duck, "lion," etc. Of the genus homo, we have all varieties. Least plentiful of these—but still we have them—are what the French call gobe-mouche—fly-gobblers. Fellows who sit with their mouths wide open, living fly-traps, and when a fly enters, spring the machine, and gobble him up—bad luck to the fly!

The ignorance of an intelligent man, talking of something which he does not understand, is said to be refreshing. The utterances of stupidity are sometimes sublime. Such utterances deserve commemoration. They ought not to perish utterly.

The gobe-mouche par excellence of California—the fly-gobbler in chief—is the person who writes the "foreign" editorials for the Alta California. His trap is always set, always ready for the fly, always ready to shut down with equal gusto on black or mottled, blue or bottle green.

One of the biggest flies that gobe-mouche has caught lately, was the Prussian needle gun. Prodigious was the slaughter inflicted by this third-rate breech-loader at Sadowa, and the science of chemistry recoiled before the secret of its cartridge. The world found out long ago that the needle gun had very little to do with the battle of Sadowa, and that the cartridge is no mystery. But gobe-mouche has not discovered this, and he will never find it out. He will drivel on about the needle-gun to the end.

Napoleon III asked for an extension of frontier, but Prussia declined to concede it—at present. The world knows that the French Emperor was compelled to make the request, because some of the Rhenish provinces invoked his protection. It knows, too, that Bismarck promised the extension beforehand, but dared not grant it, just then, on account of the temper of his own people. It knows, too, that the extension is sure to come. Gobe-mouche doesn't see it, never will see it—even when it happens.

Gobe-mouche thinks France was snubbed by Prussia, and would have "pitched in" if Russia had not been waiting in force to prevent it. It turns out that Russia had invited France to join with her and take a share of the spoil; and that France declined. Still gobe-mouche thinks Napoleon III is an imperial Toots.

Gobe mouche thinks Prussia, with her population of 29,000,000, more than one-third of whom hate her as New Orleans hates Butler, is more than a match for France, Austria, and Russia. Gobe mouche thinks that Prussia, for a moment successful in a career of perjury, perfidy, and violence, which was hardly equalled in our own rebellion, has made herself the first power in Europe. Gobe-mouche does not understand that the only security Prussia has is her secret understanding with Napoleon III.

The Emperor of the French transacts his own business, without the aid of even a Secretary of War; therefore, reasons gobe mouche, his brain is softening; he smokes cigars prodigiously, therefore his physical strength is all gone; he rides out daily on horseback, therefore he has a diseased prostate; he goes out shooting on foot, therefore he is paralyzed in both legs!

But the last luxury of a big green bottle-fly, caught by gobe-mouche, was the telegraphic report that the surgeon-in chief of the Prussian army, having been sent for to consult upon the health of Napoleon III, had informed the Prussian embassy, at Paris, that he could not possibly recover, and that the embassy telegraphed that information to Berlin, so that the newspaper correspondents immediately got hold of it. Any one else might possibly have surmised that Napoleon's sending for the chief surgeon of the Prussian army was only a studied notification to the world of intimate relations between the two countries. Not so gobe-mouche. He actually believes that the Prussian surgeon-in-chief, thus confidentially consulted, told the Prussian embassy, at Paris, that Napoleon could not recover, and that the embassy, at half a day's easy travel from Berlin, telegraphed that information; so that the public got hold of it! O blissful gobe-mouche, to be happy with a mouthful of such flies as these!

THE NEW HOSPITAL.

ALTHOUGH the most natural and spontaneous association in connection with the idea of a hospital is not of an æsthetic character, the new City Hospital, so far as we can judge from an examination of the plans, is destined to be one of the chief architectural ornaments of the city. The plan seems to be both ingenious and beautiful, and it is also pronounced strikingly original by physicians who have visited the great hospitals of Europe. It combines the advantages of a wide separation of the pavilions with facility of access to the various wards, in a way that has not heretofore been adopted for that purpose, and that it would seem impossible to secure by any other disposition of the buildings. The Hospital will contain twelve wards, and will accommodate three hundred patients; it will have a front of four hundred and twenty-five feet, with a depth of two hundred and fifty feet.

Though the exterior has but little ornamentation, and is not at all in the "florid" style, its broken outline, bold details, and massive proportions will give it a very striking effect. The location, on an elevated piece of land, a portion of the San Miguel Ranch, near Lake Honda, is admirably chosen, and it will be one of the most prominent landmarks of the city. The plans were drawn by Messrs. Bugbee and Butler, architects of this city, to whom a premium of $250 00 was awarded for them, as the best offered in competition. No difference of opinion existed either in the Committee of the Board of Supervisors, or among the physicians invited by the Board to advise with them on the subject, in regard to the superiority of the plans finally adopted.

CELESTIAL PYROTECHNICS.

THERE seems to be a very general expectation in certain scientific circles that Tuesday and Wednesday nights, November 13th and 14th, will witness the recurrence of one of those great meteoric showers such as were seen all over North America on the 13th of November, 1833. On that occasion, as will be remembered by those of our readers who have passed the middle term of life, from about an hour after midnight till nearly dawn, the whole heavens were illuminated by a most imposing meteoric display. Arago has estimated that not less than two hundred and forty thousand meteors were visible on the morning of the 13th above the horizon of Boston; and the display was witnessed by the inhabitants of the greater portion of the North American Continent.

The savans who have devoted special attention to this stupendous phenomenon, have suggested the theory that meteoric showers, similar to that of 1833, are periodic, and that their returns are separated from one another by the third of a century, or some multiple of that period. Between the years 903 and 1833, thirteen of these great showers are recorded; how many more actually occurred, we are left to guess. It is now stated in some of the Eastern papers that Professor Newton, of Yale College, who has devoted much time to the investigation of the periodic character of these showers, predicts a prodigious and imposing meteoric display on the 13th or 14th of the present month. Those who have faith will probably be on the qui vive on the nights of Tuesday and Wednesday week.

MR. CHARLES WARREN STODDARD seems to be the most widely appreciated, at the East, of all our California poets. In fact, he is so extensively appreciated that quite a number of the Atlantic literary papers have fallen into the habit of republishing his poems, contributed to THE CALIFORNIAN, as original contributions to themselves. The last instance of this species of literary larceny that has fallen under our observation is the publication of Mr. Stoddard's "Vespers," originally published in this journal, in the Boston Wide World as an original contribution, headed, "Written for the Wide World."

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"The gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I will roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me."
A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I will aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

A Delightful Scandal.

THE Alta, Call, and, we regret to say, the Bulletin also, served up a little bit of scandal with sauce piquante a few days ago, when there was not the slightest necessity for their readers to be informed on the matter. A marriage was to have taken place and did not take place, in consequence of the bridegroom's impecuniosity. That was all. The Bulletin, in the most unwarrantable manner, dragged the clergyman, who was to have officiated on the occasion, before the public, and on the day following had to apologize as follows:

"A MISTAKE.—In the published accounts of the matrimonial fiasco across the Bay, allusion was made to a church dignitary, who was to have officiated had the ceremony taken place. There is reason to believe that the reverend gentleman in question was ignorant of the antecedents of the affair, and was deceived as to the character of the person by whom his services were engaged. He was acquainted with the unquestioned respectability of the lady in the case, was called upon and attended exclusively in the way of clerical duty, and was as much surprised at the result as were the public."

We were not aware that the Episcopal Church required parties desirous of being joined together in the bonds of holy matrimony to furnish proofs of their "respectability." We were also unaware that in a case where a clergyman of the Episcopal Church married parties who were not respectable, any odium would attach to him for so doing. The fact of the matter is, that the Bulletin is heartily ashamed of having lent its aid to manufacture a scandal out of a matter in which the public at large had no concern. The contradiction published above is a slight enough apology for the statement which appeared in the Bulletin of Monday:

"Then, again, the Baron was indorsed by respectable people, and had a firm friend in a high dignitary of the Episcopal Church, we might say the high dignitary, who is said to have used his utmost endeavors as a matchmaker in the premises."

The idea of a high dignitary of the Church acting in the capacity of "matchmaker" is an unpleasant one; the Bulletin had no right to represent the pastor as standing in any such relation to the members of his flock.

Sensational Advertisements.

In the Alta of Thursday, we find the following remarkable advertisement:

STOP THAT VILE SLANDER!

A RUMOR IS GOING THE ROUNDS that a young gentleman, who is absent from the State, drew on his father for ten thousand dollars. It is a malicious falsehood; he never drew on his father for one dollar. A more honorable young man is not to be found in this city. It is needless to say that all other reports are equally false.

We are glad to hear that "a young gentleman, who is absent from this State," did not draw upon his father for ten thousand dollars. We cannot exactly understand why a rumor to the effect that a young gentleman did draw upon his father for the aforesaid sum, should be characterized as a "vile slander." There is nothing very wrong in the fact of a young gentleman—either in this State or absent from this State—drawing on his father for ten thousand dollars, if he was in a state of impecuniosity, and his father was in a state of wealth. We are further told: "It is needless to say that all other reports are equally false." This is a most bewildering announcement. We suppose it refers to some particular young gentleman; the anonymous advertiser cannot intend to state that there is no young gentleman absent from this State who has been drawing on his governor for funds. We suppose there is some story attached to this advertisement, but what good can be accomplished by its publication, is hard to guess.

In the Call of Thursday, we find another mysterious advertisement:

PERDITA!—What do you mean? Your child will not stand this fooling any more.

This may be addressed to a lost mother whose infant has been robbed for some time of its natural sustenance, and is at present being poisoned with swill-milk by those with whom "Perdita" left it. This may be the case; if so, we trust that "Perdita" will immediately state her intentions, and inform the advertiser whether she means to reclaim her child, or if she wishes it to be disposed of. We rather imagine that the "child" referred to has been weaned for many years, but we may be mistaken. San Francisco newspapers are so dull now-a-days, that it is refreshing to find something amusing now and then in the advertising columns.

Fenianism.

The Pall Mall Gazette of September 10th says:

"Let a corps d'elite of Irish household troops be formed, attached to the royal person, and arrayed in that national color which seems so inexplicably fascinating for the Hibernian mind. A race which at San Francisco finds solace and meaning in printing a seditious journal on green paper could scarcely fail to be soothed by the sight of regiments in a uniform of green and gold. Then let the Queen have a palace or autumn retreat in one of the most lovely districts in Ireland, on Bantry Bay or on the coast of Antrim, and let her visit Ireland as regularly as she now visits Scotland. It is not to the credit of our rulers, either of their good feeling or their good sense, that this has not been done long ago. Let something of real royalty be substituted for that mock royalty which we now half contemptuously leave them, and with which we so irrationally expect them to be satisfied. Let the heir apparent fix his residence in Ireland for at least a part of every year, and thus win beforehand the affections of the people for that throne which he is one day to fill. Royalty cannot be so insensible to the few duties, and the easy obligations, and the light burdens, and the trival sacrifices to which alone it is now called, as to grudge any effort which might open so facile a way to a people's heart."

The Pall Mall Gazette makes a mistake. The Irish People was not printed on green paper; it was printed by green printers in green ink, and has now withered. The Gazette, however, is quite right in its idea of the best means to pacify Ireland and render it loyal to the British Crown. We set forth the same ideas in THE CALIFORNIAN nearly a year ago. England has enough Princes; she can well afford to spare Ireland one of them. If it would not be asking too much of the Princess Alexandra, it might, we imagine, be managed that the next of the Prince of Wales' children should be born in Ireland, and bear the title of the Prince of Ireland. If the infant proved to be a daughter, Ireland would be content, no doubt, to wait for a short time. There ought to be a Prince of Ireland—when there is, then we shall hear very little of Fenianism.

Still on the War-path.

The Triple-Thunderer of the Flag still continues to launch his bolts against the bankers, and more particularly against the Bank of California. Evidently poor Mr. Ralston (if we may be permitted the paradox of applying such an adjective to a wealthy banker) has done something to the Flag—possibly declined to take stock in it. The following, from the Flag's "leader" of Friday last, is racy, spicy, and gossipy. As to the amount of truth it embodies, that is altogether a subordinate consideration:

"Our Bank of California has curious modes of whipping the d--l around the stump: members of the 'ring' were interested in the San Francisco and Pacific Sugar Refinery, and they wanted raw sugar; besides a debt was due the bank from a partner in a bank at Honolulu and they wanted this collected; and they wanted a handy man who could write as well with his left as with his right hand, and they selected Alphabet Barnes, a bosom friend of Ralston, and he aspired to go in company with Royalty on board a United States war vessel, but the Admiral refused to take passengers, but our friend Alphabet nothing daunted, shipped as a marine on the good steamer Vanderbilt, and taking on board $50,000 or $75,000 for the purchase of the sugar crop, and armed with a bill of sale which required only the banking partner's signature to convey all his property, real and personal, including his interest in the Bank of Honolulu, to the Bank of California, took his departure amid the waving of flags and booming of artillery, which he thought were in honor of Barnes."

That Mr. Barnes did sail for Honolulu on the Vanderbilt is an indubitable fact, and it is highly probable that he had some important object in view, inasmuch as he is one of the class of men who generally act with reference to some well-defined end to be attained. Meantime, up to the date of our latest advices, the Bank of California still survived, and had not suspended specie payments.

Preparing for the Struggle.

The Alta proprietors have taken in two partners to enable them to show fight against the great Times company. In addition to this, nearly a column and a half of Thursday's issue is devoted to proving that the Alta is the most spirited and enterprising newspaper in the world, and has the best furnished offices ever heard of. We are told that "each editorial room is carpeted, and neatly furnished," and we understand that even the local items room has a piece of matting in it. Prodigious luxury! The composition room is described as something gorgeous:

"Each stand, case, stone, galley, and frame is varnished, and the whole is more like a parlor than a workshop."

Think of that, ye unhappy compositors who are engaged to work on the Times! You won't get any such luxuries as varnished stones there. You will have to work in a shop, while the composition room of the Alta is "more like a parlor than a workshop."

The proprietors have been too modest; they have not mentioned half the luxuries which they provide for their printers. In addition to the varnish, each case has a cigar-box in it, and cigars are distributed every morning. Costly porcelain spittoons are placed in different portions of the parlor. Lager beer is laid on in pipes throughout the establishment, and champagne is served out—a bottle to each man—twice a day. The Alta office has become a printers' Paradise, and no devil is now allowed to enter therein.

To be Weighed in the Balance.

The Dramatic Chronicle has kindly assumed the responsible task of passing authoritative judgment upon the merits of the new "leading" daily. The Chronicle for Friday says:

"On Monday, the first number of the Times, that long-talked-of and most extensively and gratuitously advertised paper, will appear. We shall carefully, critically and most impartially examine its first issue. Those who wish to know what sort of a paper the Times is, have only to consult the Dramatic Chronicle of Tuesday morning. We have no prejudice against the Times, and no partiality toward it. We shall give it whatever credit it may deserve. We shall weigh it in the scales of strict and impartial justice, and speak of it in such terms as the facts of the case may seem to justify. Its leaders, minor editorials, paragraphs, squibs, news matter, selections, poetry, etc., etc., will be carefully and thoroughly analyzed, grammatically, rhetorically and logically. We shall take the whole measure of the new paper. If it is inferior to our able contemporaries, the Alta and the Call, we shall say so without hesitation, and vice versa. Therefore, all persons who take any interest in the new enterprise are requested to wait (before subscribing) until they see Tuesday's Chronicle. We will tell them all about the merits of the new paper, and we need not assure the habitual readers of our paper that what we do tell them will be unbiased, impartial and thoroughly reliable."

We trust the Times may be able to pass a creditable examination, but if its merits are to be adjudged upon the contents of its first number, the decision ought not to be considered final. We think it would be no more than fair to allow the new journalistic candidate for public favor at least a week to "make a record."

An Actress in Sunday School.

If little Alice Kingsbury, who has for weeks past been delighting San Francisco audiences by her talents, is "an actress," she is evidently resolved not to relinquish her claims as a woman. She does not recognize any incompatibility between the roles of an actress, and a saint. She plays at the theatre, but then she goes regularly to church, and "teaches in Sunday School." Week before last, Alice went to the Baptist Church, (Doctor Cheney's,) and volunteered her services to teach a class in the Sunday School. The offer was accepted; Alice was installed as instructress of a class, and at the close of the exercises of the day the Superintendent complimented her on the efficient and skilful manner in which she had performed her duties. Not long afterwards, however, this same Superintendent, in the course of a gushing exhortation to the children, warned them to shun the theatre, as the vestibule of hell, and characterized actors and actresses as "emissaries of Satan." Of course spunky little Alice couldn't stand that. Accordingly up she rises, draws herself up to the full height of her imposing stature, declares herself "an actress" and also "a member of the church," makes an eloquent, "powerful, and logical plea for the drama," and in short (figuratively speaking,) knocks the sanctimonious Superintendent clean out of his (logical) boots. Hurrah for little Alice! say we. Those extra pious fellows had better let her alone if they know what's good for themselves.

The Aerial Machine.

Owing to many alterations and improvements in the new Aerial Machine, it is not likely to start for some time on its voyage to Europe. The first of April is, however, confidently named as the probable date of departure. His Imperial Majesty, Norton I, who is known to be somewhat flighty, has graciously consented to avail himself of this opportunity of visiting his brother potentates in the Eastern hemisphere.

To be Corrected.

Certain public-spirited and enterprising individuals propose, as we learn from a notice in the daily papers, "to correct and put in proper shape the jurisprudence of the States and Territories of the Pacific coast, which has become corrupted by being mixed with Spanish and Mexican laws." This desirable result is to be accomplished through the influence of a new publication to be entitled the Pacific Law Magazine, to be issued by "D. S. Cutter & Co., 522 Merchant street, San Francisco."

We wish the philanthropic and learned gentlemen who propose to "correct and put in proper shape" our "corrupted jurisprudence" all success in their laudable but arduous undertaking; and we trust that their intellectual and other resources may not prove inadequate to the somewhat ambitious enterprise.

Questions for "The Times."

Before another issue of THE CALIFORNIAN appears, the Times will have been ushered into existence. The public mind is agitated at present with speculations as to the course which the Times will take on the great questions of the day. Will it be in favor of or opposed to swill-milk? How will it stand on the Nicolson Pavement question? Will it publish its reports of murders, suicides, burglaries, etc., in the exquisitely humorous style which has been rendered so popular by Fitz Smythe? Will it convulse its readers with laughter by satirical allusions to President Johnson's former occupation, like the Flag? How many poets will it have, or will it have a Poet's Corner at all? Well, well! we shall soon know all about it. We wish the new paper well, and trust that we shall never see the Times out of joint; if we do, we shall be under the painful necessity of setting it right.

No Soap.

The steamer which left on Tuesday took a number of articles for exhibition, from California, at the World's Fair at Paris in May, 1867. We noticed, with pain, that there was no mention made of soap. At every State and County Fair the samples of soap exhibited are numerous. In every catalogue we have noticed entries such as the following: "Soft soap, Miss Mary Tompkins;" "A box of soap, Miss Smith;" "Soap made of kitchen waste, Miss Brown" We trust that some California soft soap will be forwarded to the World's Fair. Let it not be said that, in the list of the productions of California at the World's Fair, there was no soap.

The Second Artillery.

The Alta indorses the Second Artillery as good soldiers. The country is safe. Fitz Smythe thinks that the soldiers of the Second Artillery can win battles—under certain circumstances. In Tuesday's issue of the Alta he says:

"The men of the Second Artillery look like thorough soldiers, as they are, and are just the kind to win battles where courage, dash, and determination are required."

We sincerely trust that the men of the Second Artillery will never be called upon to win battles where courage, dash, and determination are not required. We wonder what kind of battles Fitz Smythe has been used to.

Nothing Remarkable.

The Alta boasts that it has eleven editors. This does not strike us as a remarkable fact. We saw, the other day, thirteen children engaged in constructing a huge mud pie; it amused the children, but none but its constructors appeared to appreciate it when it was finished.

It is reported that the new office of the Alta has a complete laundry attached to it.

OUR CORRESPONDENT, "Spiradella," indulges in some just strictures upon the course of the daily press of this city in reference to a recent painful affair at Clinton. It seems to us that there can be no room for any difference of opinion among persons of correct notions and delicacy of feeling as to the gross impropriety of the manner in which the affair alluded to was treated by the leading daily papers of San Francisco. The affair was private in its character; none of the parties concerned were public personages, and in the attempt to furnish an entertaining "item" the local writers for the papers referred to were guilty not only of gross violations of taste and propriety, but of the reckless misstatement of facts. This species of "local" journalism is not only essentially vulgar, but, in cases like the one in question, it is unjust and cruel. Its only object must be to cater to a depraved taste for scandal and gossip.

A NEW HAMPSHIRE GOLD MINE.—A gentleman on his annual tour to the White Mountains, a year ago, discovered rocks containing gold near Lisbon, N. H. A company of Hartford and Springfield merchants was formed, which purchased the property in which the ore was found. The stock, worth a year ago $5 a share, now sells for $5,000. Some of the quartz yields $867 of gold per ton, and $150 of silver.

VILE WRETCHES.—We beseech and implore the editors of country papers to refrain from heading notices of deaths "In memorium." Have these wretches who pretend to show respect to the dead no respect for a dead language? At least twice out of three times "memorium" is printed for "memoriam."—Dramatic Chronicle.

THE San Francisco Amateurs will give their eleventh Subscription Entertainment at Turn-Verein Hall, on Thursday evening, November 15th. Othello will be performed on that occasion, which will be the last night of the present subscription season. We acknowledge a card of invitation.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.—A Western editor lately married one of his compositors, another compositor acting as bridesmaid, the officiating clergyman being a retired printer, and the local editor giving the bride away.

"In lifting the kettle from the fire I scalded myself very severely—one hand almost to a crisp. The torture was unbearable. * * * * The Mexican Mustang Liniment relieved the pain almost immediately. It healed rapidly, and left very little scar.

"CHAS. FOSTER, 420 Broad street, Philada."

This is merely a sample of what the Mustang Liniment will do. It is invaluable in all case, of wounds, swellings, sprains, cuts, bruises, spavin, etc., either upon man or beast.

Beware of counterfeits. None is genuine unless wrapped in fine steel-plate engravings, bearing the signature of G. W. Westhrook, Chemist, and the private stamp of DEMAS BARNES & Co., New York.

AGUA DE MAGNOLIA.—The prettiest thing, the "sweetest thing," and the most of it for the least money. It overcomes the odor of perspiration; softens and adds delicacy to the skin; is a delightful perfume; allays headache and inflammation, and is a necessary companion in the sick room, in the nursery and upon the toilet sideboard. It can be obtained everywhere at one dollar per bottle.

LYON'S MAGNETIC INSECT POWDER is instant death to Fleas, Ticks, Roaches, and everything of the insect species. It is one of the few articles that can be relied upon, and for a mere wo bits we can save the bites and bills of these little pests. None is genuine unless signed by E. Lyon, and bearing the private stamp of Demas Darnes & Co., New York.

ALL WHO VALUE A BEAUTIFUL HEAD OF HAIR, and its preservation from premature baldness and turning gray, will not fail to use Lyon's Celebrated KATHAIRON. It makes the hair rich, soft, and glossy, eradicates dandruff, and causes the hair to grow with luxuriant beauty. It is sold everywhere. E. THOMAS LYON, Chemist, N. Y.

LYON'S EXTRACT OF PURE JAMAICA GINGER, for Indigestion. Nausea, Heartburn, Sick Headache, Cholera Morbus, &c., where a warming, genial stimulant is required Its careful preparation and entire purity make it a cheap and reliable article for culinary purposes. Sold everywhere, at 50 cents per bottle.

NO FORFEITING.—Heretofore, if a person holding a Life Policy became unfortunate, and could not raise the sum of money required to pay his next premium, his policy was declared forfeited. The BROOKLYN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK has decided to make EVERY POLICY it issues NON-FORFEITABLE, giving a PAID-UP POLICY to the party if unable to continue his payments of premiums. The dividends of the Brooklyn Life Insurance Company are settled annually in cash. This plan is far more acceptable to insurers than at the end of three or five years, as in other companies. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company allows thirty days grace in the payment of premiums. Its policies are incontestable, and its losses are promptly paid. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company offers every known plan of Life and Endowment Insurance. Get a pamphlet at the office. 240 Montgomery street, southeast corner of Pine, from Stephen T. King, General Manager, or David B. Arrowsmith, Local Agent.

MAYER'S BAZAAR is one of the features of San Francisco. Here can be found the greatest variety of watches, jewelry, silver-plated ware, guitars, music-boxes, concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, and articles of bijouterie for presents or mementos for both ladies and gentlemen. Here, too, you can purchase at prices that defy competition. The present stock must be reduced, and the proprietors are determined to sell so low that the prices asked cannot be objected to. Those heavy cased silver watches from the American Watch company, so celebrated for their correct time and superior workmanship, can be bought at Mayer's Bazaar at the company's prices. Superior French opera-glasses of great magnifying power for sale or hire Family clocks, musical instruments, and every description of fancy groods at reduced rates at MAYER'S BAZAAR, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

A SCENE IN VENICE.

ABOUT nightfall came the market boats on their way to the Rialto market, bringing heaped fruits and vegetables from the main land; and far into the night the soft dip of the oar and the gurgling progress of the boats were company and gentlest lullaby. By which time, if we looked out again, we found the moon risen, and the ghost of dead Venice shadowily happy in haunting the lonesome palaces, and the sea, which had so loved Venice, kissing and caressing the tide-worn marble steps, where her feet seemed to rest. At night, sometimes, we saw from our balcony one of those frescoes, which once formed the chief splendor of festive occasions in Venice, and are peculiar to the city where alone their fine effects are possible. The fresco is a procession of boats with music and lights. Two immense barges, illuminated with hundreds of paper lanterns, carry the military bands; the barges of the civil and military dignitaries follow, and then the gondolas of such citizens as choose to take part in the display, though since 1859 no Italian, unless an employee of Government, has been seen in the procession. No gondola has less than two lanterns, and many have eight or ten, shedding mellow lights of blue, and red, and purple, over uniforms and silken robes. The soldiers of the bands breathe from their instruments music the most perfect and exquisite of its kind in the world; and as the procession takes the width of the Grand Canal in its magnificent course, soft crimson flushes play upon the time-worn marble of the palaces, and die tenderly away, giving to light and then to shadow the opulent sculptures of arch, and pillar, and spandril, and weirdly illuminating the grim and bearded visages of stone that peer down from doorway and window. It is a sight more gracious and fairy than ever poet dreamed; and I feel that the lights and the music have only got into my description by name, and that you would not know them when you saw and heard them, from anything I say.—Howell's Venetian Life.

Ennui.

THE day comes up above the roofs
All sallow from a night of rain;
The sound of feet, of wheels and hoofs
In the blurred streets begin again.

The same old toil—no end—no aim,
The same vile babble in my ears;
The same unmeaning smiles; the same
Most miserable dearth of tears.

The same vile sounds: the same dull lack
Of lustre in the level gray!
It seems like Yesterday come back
With his old things, and not To-Day.

—Owen Meredith.

THE LARGEST DESCRIBED SNAKE.—Mr. Speke, in his work on the discovery of the sources of the Nile, thus describes the death of a snake of the boa species, shot by his traveling companion, Captain Grant: "I shuddered as I looked upon the effects of his tremendous dying strength. For yards around where he lay, grass and bushes and saplings, and in fact everything except the more fully grown trees, were cut clean off, as though they had been trimmed with an immense scythe. The monster, when measured, was fifty-one feet two and a half inches in extreme length, while round the thickest portion of his body the girth was nearly three feet; thus proving, I believe, to be the largest serpent that was ever authentically heard of."

TAURUS AFLOAT.—Recently a two-year old bull was picked up at sea, off Chebeaque Island, Maine. The animal was five miles from the main land at the spot in the vasty deep where he was overhauled, and it is supposed he was on his way to visit his English cousin Johnny. Having been taken in tow, with his nose clear of the brine, Bossy was safely brought to land.

AN humble-bee has been known to distance a locomotive going at the rate of twenty miles an hour, a dragon fly to escape from a swallow after an hour's chase. A few burying-beetles will place a mole under the earth in an hour, which is a feat equal to as many men burying a large whale in the same space of time.

AGENTS WANTED TO CANVASS FOR THE only official Southern History of the War. THE LOST CAUSE, by E. A. Pollard, the popular Historian of the South, and editor of the Richmond Examiner during the war. Complete in one large royal octavo volume, with

24 FINE STEEL PORTRAITS,

giving a full and authentic account of the rise and fall of the late Southern Confederacy. Written under the encouragement of Generals R. E. Lee, Johnston, Beauregard and others. The work is being liberally patronized by leading men of all classes, eager to hear

"THE OTHER SIDE,"

and thus arrive at the truth of history, which it is impossible to do from the many histories written only from a Northern stand-point.

Agents and the public are cautioned against any other work purporting to be this one. To energetic men and women a rare chance is offered to make money. Don't fail to send for circulars of this great and important work. Address

F. E. SHEAR, General Agent,

No. 8 Montgomery street, San Francisco.

AYER'S

Cathartic Pills,

ARE THE MOST PERFECT purgative which we are able to produce, or which we think has ever yet been made by anybody. Their effects have abundantly shown to the community how much they excel the ordinary medicines in use. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. Their penetrating properties stimulate the vital activities of the body, remove the obstructions of its organs, purify the blood, and expel disease. They purge out the foul humors which breed and grow distemper, stimulate sluggish or disordered organs into their natural action, and impart a healthy tone with strength to the whole system. Not only do they cure the everyday complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases. While they produce powerful effects, they are at the same time, in diminished doses, the safest and best physic that can be employed for children. Being sugar-coated, they are pleasant to take; and, being purely vegetable, are free from any risk of harm. Cures have been made which surpass belief, were they not substantiated by men of such exalted position and character, as to forbid the suspicion of untruth. Many eminent clergymen and physicians have lent their names to certify to the public the reliability of our remedies, while others have sent us the assurance of their conviction that our Preparations contribute immensely to the relief of our afflicted, suffering fellow men.

The Agent below named is pleased to furnish gratis our American Almanac, containing directions for the use and certificates of their cures, of the following complaints.

Costiveness, Billious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache arising from foul stomach, Nausea, Indigestion, Morbid Inaction of the Bowels and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Diseases which require an evacuant medicine. They also, by purifying the blood and stimulating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach, such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability, Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout, and other kindred complaints arising from a low state of the body, or obstruction of its functions.

Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand AYER'S and take no others. The sick want the best and there is for them, and they should have it.

Prepared by J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by

CRANE & BRIGHAM, San Francisco, and all Dealers

HESPERUS.

AWAKE, O beautiful Hesperus!
Awake! for the day is done,
And the royal purple curtains are drawn
Round the couch of the sleeping sun;
There is a hush on the blooming earth,
A hush on the beating sea,
And silence, too, in the courts of Heaven,
For the stars all wait for thee,
Hesperus!
All things beautiful wait for thee!

Thou art smiling down on me, Hesperus,
With that smile upon my heart;
I know that kindred to me and mine,
In those measureless heights, thou art.
When thy spirit blossomed into a star,
In the mystical days of old,
The love and the hope it bore on high
The legend hath never told.
Hesperus!
Thy sweetest story hath never been told.

FEMALE FRIENDSHIP.

IT is wonderful advantage to a man, in every pursuit or avocation, to secure an adviser in a sensible woman. In woman there is at once a subtle delicacy of tact, a plain soundness of judgment, which are rarely combined to an equal degree in man. A woman, if she be really your friend, will have a sensitive regard for your character, honor, repute. She will seldom counsel you to do a shabby thing, for a woman friend always desires to be proud of you. At the same time, her constitutional timidity makes her more cautious than your male friend. She therefore seldom counsels you to do an imprudent thing. By female friendships I mean pure friendships—those in which there is no admixture of the passion of love, except in the married state. A man's best female friend is a wife of good sense and good heart, whom he loves, and who loves him. If he have that, he need not seek elsewhere. But supposing the man be without such a helpmate, female friendships he must still have, or his intellect will be without a garden, and there will be many an unheeded gap even in its strongest fence. Better and safer, of course, are such friendships where disparities of circumstances put the idea of love out of the question. Middle life has rarely this advantage; youth and old age have. We may have female friendships with those much older, and those much younger than ourselves. Moliere's old housekeeper was a great help to his genius; and Montague's philosophy takes both a gentler and loftier character of wisdom from the date in which he finds in Marie de Gourney, an adopted daughter, "certainly beloved by me," says the Horace of essayists, "with more than paternal love, and involved in my solitude of retirement, as one of the best parts of my being." Female friendship, indeed, is to man the bulwark, sweetener, ornament of his existence. To his mental culture it is invaluable; without it all his knowledge of books will never give him knowledge of the world.—Sir E. B, Lytton.

In every material action of your life, consider well of its probable result.

A FAST STORY.

AN ENGLISHMAN was bragging of the speed of English railroads to a Yankee traveler seated at his side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in England. The engine bell was rung as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportunity of "taking down his companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innocently inquired the Yankee.

"We are approaching a town," said the Englishman: "they have to commence ringing about ten miles before they get to a station, or else the train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I suppose they haven't invented bells in America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, "we've got bells, but can't use them on our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead of the sound: the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee. "Why, we've got one firm in San Francisco that has alone imported this season a half a million dollars' worth of Toys and Fancy Goods. They have Talking and Kicking Dolls, born with a full-grown head of hair and teeth in their mouths, saying 'Papa' and 'Mamma', also, Mechanical Toys, that run by themselves, and lots of other Toy wonders too numerous to mention."

"Indeed! is that so? Who is the firm that have the Dolls saying 'Mamma'?" exclaimed the Englishman, very much excited.

"Why, have you never heard in all your travels of FELDBUSH & CO., Wholesale Store, 307 California street, and Retail Store, 207 Montgomery street, San Francisco, where you can save 25 per cent. in purchasing? Fact, I can assure you, as all the goods in their store, 307 California street, and all that is to arrive, must be sold on or before Christmas, on account of some changes in their business. I know it is true, and, if you doubt my word, you call at FELDBUSH & CO.'S, and see for yourself."

STOP THAT COUGHING.

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure. but

NEWELL'S

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup

Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup.

THIS IS A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY, and stands above comparison with any other article for the Hair ever brought before the public.

A PERFECT

Hair Restorer AND Hair Dresser

BOTH COMBINED IN ONE.

First—It is not a Dye.
Second—Will not Color the Skin.
Third—Will restore Gray Hair to a beautiful Black, Brown, Auburn, or whatever might have been its original color, and cause it to assume its former beauty.
Fourth—Will cure all Humors and Diseases of the Scalp.
Fifth—Will remove Dandruff and Scurf from the head, and keep the hair moist and silk like in its appearance as in youthful days.
Sixth—Will promote a healthy growth.
Seventh—Will prevent it from falling off, and cause it to grow on bald heads where there is life and vitality at the roots, but where these are gone there is no hope of success.
Eighth—The best testimony that can be given will be found inside of each bottle.

Warranted to do all we claim for it, or the money refunded after using two bottles. Try it and be convinced.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

A PRAIRIE BELLE.

IN 1854, Captain Marcy was returning from an exploration of the Brazos River. Near the most remote frontier-house, he met a young man and three girls, picking grapes. One of the girls, a fine, buxom lass, volunteered to guide the party to her father's house, and was given a seat in the captain's wagon, which contained himself and a friend, a New-York gentleman. The latter offered his hand, to help her into the vehicle; but she declined his assistance, and, with one bound, cleared the side, and landed safely in the wagon.

"She appeared," says Captain Marcy, "to be about eighteen years of age, with a rather masculine physique, her figure tall, erect, and lithe, but well rounded, and exceedingly graceful and feminine in outline, the incarnation of perfect health. Her face was thoroughly browned, by exposure and exercise in the open air (she had probably never seen or heard of such a hot-house appendage as a sunshade,) and was constantly lighted up with a cheerful, happy expression, indicating an overflowing exuberance of spirits, which disseminated an atmosphere around her, the fascination of which was irresistible to those who came within its influence; and her laughing, dancing blue eyes seemed ever on the qui vive for fun and frolic. She wore a closely fitting bloomer costume, with a jaunty little straw hat set upon one side of her head, fastened, under the chin, with a pretty pink ribbon. And her luxurious natural hair curled, in ringlets, all over her shoulders. "She was evidently the reigning belle of the neighborhood, as well as the favorite, spoiled child of her family; and she was just as wild, untamed, and free from the absurd, tyrannical conventionalities of society, as the mustangs that roamed over the adjacent prairies.

"My companion related to her some of the most remarkable incidents of our expedition, which seemed to interest her vastly; but, at the same time, her credulity appeared to be somewhat taxed, and would occasionally find utterance in such ejaculations as 'O, git out!' 'You go 'long now!' 'Look at him!' etc.; which seemed the spontaneous outbursts of her impulsive nature, and rather in the character of a soliloquy, than seriously intended to express doubt as to the truth of the narrative.

"In one instance, she became intensely absorbed in my friend's account of a visit we received from the Comanches, and some of the peculiar habits of those people, and gave vent to her feelings by administering a violent slap upon his knee, and at the same time exclaiming energetically—'The de-v-i-l you say, stranger!'"

A BALLOON ADVENTURE.—The balloon which was picked up in Lake Ontario, on Tuesday, October 2d, ascended from Albion. When it was partially inflated the supply of gas gave out, and the person who was to make the ascension was taking it to the gas works to fill it; but a young man named Collins offered to make the ascension and his offer was accepted. The basket was disconnected, and a board upon which to sit substituted for it. Collins seated himself, and the balloon rose. It barely missed striking the spire of a church, and in passing over the canal was reversed, and Collins was dragged some distance through the water—a portion of the time none of his body being visible. The balloon finally rose again and swept through an orchard, and then again came to the ground, whereupon Collins jumped from his seat. The balloon, relieved of his weight, soared away. Collins was somewhat injured.

RAVENOUS.—A traveler in Montana relates that in some of the streams at the sources of the large rivers, the speckled trout are so ravenous that they bite at anything. He says that they even followed him into the woods and bit at the spurs on his boots as he rode away.

A TRAGICAL RECORD.—France has had sixty-seven Queens. Eleven were divorced; two executed; nine died young; seven were widowed early; three cruelly treated; three exiled; the rest were either poisoned or broken-hearted.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND

IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

For sale by CALEB M. SICKLER,

Between California and Pine, San Francisco.

OLD MUSIC.

BACK from the misty realms of Time,
Back from the years agone,
Faintly we catch the ringing rhyme,
And bear the melody and chime
Of olden songs, of strains sublime,
Like carol of birds at dawn.

And ever we hear them, soft and low,
Harping their music sweet,
Songs that we loved in the long ago,
Rippling their liquid ebb and flow,
Drifting their cadence to and fro,
Like the fall of fairy feet.

Some faces our hearts will ever hold,
Some smiles we remember yet.
There were flowing locks like the sunset's gold,
There were parted lips of Cupid's mould,
And the songs they sang can ne'er grow old,
For our hearts can ne'er forget.

The tunes that the voice of girlhood sung,
The chords that we loved full well
When hopes were buoyant, hearts were young,
When fairy bells in the flower-cups rung,
And ever fell from a maiden's tongue
The words of a witching spell.

Ah, welladay! 'tis a story past,
Which I may not tell again,
'Twas a happiness too sweet to last;
The heavy clods on her grave are cast,
And her voice is still, and above her, fast
Falls the Summer rain! —J. F. F.

OLD RED-LETTER DAYS.—Every one will understand what is meant here by Red-letter Days. We have all our official red-letter days, when it is incumbent on us to be happy and joyful in demeanor, and when all the necessary preparations have been made to that end. There is the picnic, the pleasure party by rail, when we go out to enjoy ourselves as by recipe, and—do not. These are the regulation red-letter days, when we feast and make merry, as per order; but fail signally. We find, then, that we may call our spirits from the vasty deep, or any other quarter, but they decline to come. No; every red-letter day, if the reader will search back his memory, will be proved to be accidental. Every one of us have—or should have, unless we be Miserrimus—a few of these glorified milestones along the rutty, dusty, ill-watered, weary high road which we are all trudging along and call life. The most exhausted and battered tramp of us all has found these little bits of green grass, these shady places, into which he has turned from glare and the dust, and dropped down to rest his limbs. But these places, as I have said before, were not the places set down in the guides and road-books, but merely turned up by chance. If we search back for those pleasant spots, we shall find that all these dissolving views, settling before us with trembling, quivering, and faint colors, are not cunningly and artfully devised beforehand.—Our Red-Letter Days in "All the Year Round."

Taking Snuff.

Knows he that never took a pinch,
Nosey, the pleasure thence that flows?
Knows he the titillating joy
Which my nose knows?

O nose! I am as proud of thee
As any mountain of its snows;
I gaze on thee, and feel the joy
A Roman knows!

THE PEACE OF SLEEP.—The peace of sleep is nearly as beautiful as the peace of death—nearly as beautiful as that unutterable calm whose placidity awes us when we sob over our lost ones, and compels us to pause in our weeping, and gaze on the face whose many changes were so familiar and so dear; yearning for a break in that calm, a quiver in that strange, set smile—something that shall seem human and sympathetic—something we know not what, that will not freeze us with such intense conviction that the smiles, and tears, and sunshine, and shadow of earth's emotions are over, and that what we love has passed away to the world where there is no more change.

NEVER despise counsels, from whatever quarter they reach you. Remember that the pearl is keenly sought for, in spite of the coarse shell which envelopes it.

To bear evil speaking and illiterate judgments with unanimity, is the highest bravery. It is, in fact, the repose of mental courage.

HOSTETTER, SMITH & DEAN,
401 Battery street, corner of Clay, San Francisco

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California:
In the matter of the Estate of BENJAMIN P. GREEN, deceased.

It appearing to the Court, by the petition presented and filed by Thomas Courtis, the Administrator of the Estate of Benjamin P. Green, deceased, praying for an order to sell Real Estate, that it is necessary to sell the whole of the Real Estate to pay the debt outstanding against the deceased, and the debts, expenses, and charges of the administration,

It is therefore ordered by the Court, that all persons interested in the said Estate appear before the said Probate Court on Monday, the 25th day of November, A. D. 1866, at eleven o'clock A. M. of the said day, at the Court-room of said Probate Court, in the City Hall in said City and County of San Francisco, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administrator to sell the whole of the Real Estate of deceased, as prayed for in said petition; and that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated October 23d, A. D. 1866.

ESTATES UPON WHICH LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION HAVE BEEN ISSUED, BUT NO PROPERTY RECEIVED.

Letters of Administration have been issued on the following Estates, but no Money or other Property has come into the possession of the Administrator, nor any Fees received thereon. The Property of several Estates consists of claims to land not yet determined:

Robert Dyson, T. B. McManus, John J. Coombs, C. E. Trask, Wm. F. Hamilton, Charles S. Norris, Huling Major, Horace Cole, James E. Calhoun, J. W. Phipps, Julia W. Burns.

The foregoing report includes all the Estates administered upon by me during the year ending June 30th, 1866.

As a number of the Estates are still unsettled, the amount of Fees cannot be stated, but the same will, on final settlement, be 4 per cent. upon the amount administered in each Estate.

All of which is respectfully submitted,
J. W. BRUMAGIM,
Public Administrator.

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE CITY and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Estate and Guardianship of MARY KEENAN, THOMAS KEENAN, and JOHN PETER KEENAN, minors.

Order to show cause on application of Guardian for order of sale of Real Estate.

It appearing to this Court, from the petition this day presented and filed by THOMAS BREEZE, the Guardian of MARY KEENAN, THOMAS KEENAN, and JOHN PETER KEENAN, minors, praying for an order of sale of certain Real Estate belonging to his said wards, that it is necessary and for the benefit of said minors that such Real Estate should be sold,

It is hereby ordered, That the next of kin of the said wards, and all persons interested in the said Estate, appear before this Court on MONDAY, the third day of December, A. D. 1866, at eleven o'clock, A. M., at the Court-room of this Court, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted for the sale of such Estate.

And it is further ordered, That a copy of this order be published at least three successive weeks, before the said day of hearing, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated November 1st, 1866.

THE "TILTERS" OF 1711.

[The following paper on "petticoats," from the Spectator of July 26, 1711—one hundred and fifty-five years ago—shows clearly that "tilters" are no new thing under the sun, and that the journalists of a century and a half ago were as strongly inclined to make them the target of their wit as those of the present day.]

MR. SPECTATOR: You have diverted the town almost a whole month at the expense of the country, it is now high time that you should give the country their revenge. Since your withdrawing from this place, the fair-sex are run into great extravagancies. Their petticoats, which began to heave and swell before you left us, are now blown up into a most enormous concave, and rise every day more and more. In short, sir, since our women know themselves to be out of the eye of the Spectator, they will be kept withiu no compass. You praised them a little too soou, for the modesty of their head-dresses; for as the humour of a sick person is often driven out of one limb into another, their superfluity of ornaments, instead of being entirely banished, seems only fallen from their heads upon their lower parts. What they have lost in height they make up in breadth, and, contrary to all rules of architecture, widen the fouudations at the same time that they shorten the superstructure. * * * As we do not yet hear any particular use in this petticoat, or that it contains any thing more than what was supposed to be iu those of scantier make, we are wonderfully at a loss about it.

The women give out, in defence of these wide bottoms, that they are airy, and very proper for the season; but this I look upon to be only a pretence, and a piece of art, for it is well known we have not had a more moderate summer these many years, so that it is certain the heat they complain of cannot be in the weather. Besides, I would fain ask these tender constitutioned ladies, why they should require more cooling than their mothers before them.

I find several speculative persons are of opinion that our sex has of late years been very saucy, and that the hoop-petticoat is made use of to keep us at a distance. It is most certain that a woman's honour cannot be better intrenched than after this manner, in circle within circle, amidst such a variety of out-works and lines of circumvallation. A female who is thus invested in whalebone, is sufficiently secured against the approaches of an ill-bred fellow, who might as well think of Sir George Etherege's way of making "Love in a Tub," as in the midst of so many hoops.

Among these various conjectures, there are men of superstitious tempers, who look upon the hoop-pettieoat as a kiud of prodigy. Some will have it that it portends the downfal of the French king, and observe that the farthingal appeared in England a little before the ruin of the Spanish monarchy. Others are of opinion that it foretells battle and bloodshed, and believe it of the same prognostication as the tail of a blazing star. For my part, I am apt to think it is a sign that multitudes are coming into the world rather than going out of it.

The first time I saw a lady dressed in one of these petticoats, I could not forbear blaming her in my own thoughts for walking abroad when she was in such condition, but soon recovered myself out of my error, when I found all the modish part of the sex were in the same condition as herself. It is generally thought some crafty women have thus betrayed their companions into hoops, that they might make them accessary to their own concealments, and by that means escape the censure of the world; as wary generals have sometimes dressed two or three dozen of their frieuds in their own habit, that they might not draw upon themselves any particular attacks from the enemy. The strutting petticoat smooths all distinctions, levels the mother with the daughter, and sets maids and matrons, wives and widows, upon the same bottom. In the mean while I cannot but be troubled to see so many well-shaped innocent virgins bloated up, and waddliug up and down like old obese women.

Should this fashion get among the ordinary people, our public ways would be so crowded, that we should want street-room. Several congregations of the best fashion find themselves already very much straitened, and if the mode increase, I wish it may not drive many ordinary women into meetings and conventicles. Should our sex at the same time take it into their heads to wear trunk breeches (as who knows what their indignation at this female treatment may drive them to?) a man and his wife would fill a whole pew.

You know, sir, it is recorded of Alexander the Great, that in his Indian expedition he buried several suits of armour, which by his directions were made much too big for any of his soldiers, in order to give posterity an extraordinary idea of him, and make them believe he had commanded an army of giants. I am persuaded that if one of the preseut petticoats happens to be hung up in any repository of curiosities, it would lead into the same error the generations that lie some removes from us; unless we can believe our posterity will think so disrespectfully of their great grand-mothers, that they made themselves monstrous to appear amiable.

When I survey this new-fashioned rotunda in all its parts, I cannot but think of the old philosopher, who after having entered into an Egyptian temple, and looked about for the idol of the place, at length discovered a little black monkey inshrined in the midst of it, upon which he could not forbear crying out, to the great scaudal of the worshippers, "What a magnificent palace is here for such a ridiculous inhabitant!"

Though you have taken a resolution, in one of your papers, to avoid descending to particularities of dress, I believe you will not think it below you, on so extraordinary an occasion, to unhoop the fair sex, and cure this fashiouable tympany that is got among them. I am apt to think the petticoat will shrink of its own accord at your first coming to town; at least a touch of your pen will make it contract itself like the sensitive plant, and by that means oblige several who are either terrified or astonished at this portentous novelty, and among the rest, Your humble servant, &c., C.

A BRAIN AND NERVE PEOPLE.—One who appears to compreheud the American people, physically speaking, says, with no little justice:

"The Americans are in fact becoming nothing else but brain and nerves. Fat and fibrine are only valued as they sell in markets, and muscle is only thought of as it pertains to our draught animals. Our stimulating climate and our fast habits make us so uervous, that life is becoming to us but one continued spasm. Our movements are like those of a dancing-jack. Even our pastimes are so intense that they fatigue us as much as our business. The so-called rest, which we so begrudgingly give ourselves, wears us as much as our work. We cannot bear to have another called more 'smart' than ourselves, and we will die and be buried rather than not become as rich as our neighbors. There is ever the same unsatisfied restlessness, whether we go abroad or stay at home. Nobody shall travel faster or see a given number of objects in a less number of hours than ourselves, no matter at what cost of money or health. There is no impossible Alps that we will not climb, and no deep cave of earth or sea that we will not explore. There are none who shall not grow numb before ourselves on the highest frozen peak, and there shall be none who can hold their breath longer under water. When the guide is not looking, there is no king's throne or pope's chair on which we will not sit. There is nothing within the scope of human ability which we will not undertake; and when we boast of what we have accomplished, there are none who shall draw a longer bow."

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES,

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, an only son and spend thrift, walks down from London to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs. Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother, which results in his obtaining a ten-pound note, and a promise that she will forward him, within one month, a hundred and forty pounds, to meet a note of indebtedness to one Routh, a friend and associate. After an interview of half an hour he leaves for the adjacent village of Amherst, where he passes the night. In the morning he changes the note, which bears a date and the post-mark of Amherst, to purchase an overcoat, and departs for London. In London, at the house of Stewart Routh, a gentlemanly gambler and adventurer of good accomplishments and address, the reader is introduced to his wife Harriet, commonly addressed by Routh as "Harry,"—a woman of rare mental qualifications and quick appreciation, thoroughly devoted to her husband, his counselor in all his schemes, and a most efficient aid in his precarious mode of living.

One Deane, an American, a cool, sharp, "posted" man, with abundant means, is also introduced, whose cleverness is even too much for the designs of Routh and his wife. George Dallas receives a letter from his mother, who writes him that the one hundred and forty pounds, obtained by a great risk and almost criminal sacrifice, will be given to him by her in person at Amherst. He informs Routh of the import of his mother's letter. Routh, meanwhile, is organizing a company for working some newly discovered silver mines in Brazil, which promises to be "a big thing," but is badly in want of funds to successfully launch his scheme.

IN THE BALANCE.

"I know you would not intentionally wound me, Mr. Dallas," she said. "I say you would not intentionally wound me," she repeated, apparently in answer to his turning sharply round and staring at her in surprise: "but you seem to forget that it was I who counselled your recent visit to your mother, and suggested your asking her for this sum of money, which you were bound in honor to pay, and without the payment of which you—who have always represented yourself most dear to her—would have been compromised forever. I am sorry I did so, now that I see my intentions were misunderstood, and I say so frankly."

"I swear to you, Har— Mrs. Routh, I had not the slightest idea of casting the least imputation on your motives; I was only thinking — You know I'm a little hot on the subject of my mother, not without reason, perhaps, for she's been a perfect angel to me, and — one can't expect other people to enter into these things; and, of course, it was very absurd. But you must forget it, please, Mrs. Routh, and you too, Stewart. If I spoke sharply or peevishly, don't mind it, old fellow!"

"I?" said Routh, with a crisp laugh. "I don't mind it; and I dare say I was very provokiug; but you see I never knew what it was to have a mother, and I'm not much indebted to my other parent. As to the money, George—these are hard times, but if the payment of it is to drive a worthy lady to distress, or is to promote discord between you and me, why, in friendship's name, keep it, I say!"

"You're a good fellow, Stewart," said Dallas, putting out his hand; "and you, Mrs. Routh, have forgiven me?" Though she only bowed her head slightly, she looked down into his face with a long, steady, earnest gaze. "There's an end of it, then, I trust," he continued; "we never have had words here, and I hope we're not going to begin now. As for the money, that must be paid. Whatever my mother has had to do is as good as done, and need not be whined over. Besides, I know you want the money, Stewart."

"That's simply to say that I am in my normal state. I always want money, my dear George."

"You shall have this, at all events. And now I must be off, as I have some work to do for the paper. See you very soon again. Good bye, Stewart. The cloud has quite passed away, Mrs. Routh?"

She said "Quite," as she gave him her hand, and their eyes met. There was eager inquiry in his glance; there was calm, steadfast earnestness in hers. Then he shook hands with Routh, and left the room.

The moment the door closed behind him, the smile faded away from Routh's face, and the stern look which it always wore when he was preoccupied and thoughtful settled down upon it. For a few minutes he was silent; then he said, in a low voice: "Harriet, for the first time in your life, I suppose, you very nearly mismanaged a bit of business I intrusted to you."

His wife looked at him with wonder-lifted brows. "I, Stewart? Not inteutionally, I need not tell you. But how?"

"I mean this business of George's. Did not you advise him to go down and see his mother?"

"I did. I told him he must get the money from her."

"A mistake, Harry, a mistake!" said Routh, petulantly. "Getting the money means paying us; paying us, means breaking with us!"

"Breaking with us?"

"Nothing less. Did you not hear him when the remorseful fit was on him just now? And don't you know that he's wonderfully young, considering all things, and has kept the bloom on his feelings in a very extraordinary manner? Did you not hear him mutter something about 'once free?' I did not like that. Harry!"

"Yes, I heard him say those words," replied Harriet. "It was my hearing them that made me go up to him and speak as I did."

"That was quite right, and had its effect. One does not know what he might have done if he had turned rusty just then. And it is essential that there should not be a rupture between us now."

"George Dallas shall not dream of breaking with us; at least, he shall not carry out any such idea; I will take care of that," said Harriet, "though I think you overrate his usefulness to us."

"Do I?. I flatter myself there is no man in London forced to gain his bread by his wits who has a better eye for a tool than myself. And I tell you, Harry, that during all the time we have been leading this shifty life together, we have never had any one so suitable to our purposes as George Dallas."

"He is certainly wonderfully amenable."

"Amenable? He is a good deal more than that; he is devoted. You know whose doing that is, Harry, and so do I. Why, when you laid your hand on his shoulder I saw him shiver like a leaf, and the first few words from you stilled what I thought was going to be a heavy storm."

She looked up anxiously into his face, but the smile had returned to his lips, and his brow was unclouded. Not perfectly satisfied, she suffered her eyes to drop again.

"I know perfectly well," pursued Routh, "that the manner in which Dallas has stuck to us has been owing entirely to the influence you have over him, and which is natural enough. He is a bright young fellow, impressionable as we are—" again her eyes were raised to his face—"at his age; and though from the scrapes he has got into, and his own natural love of play (more developed in him than any other man I ever met), though these things keep him down, he is innately a gentleman. You are the only woman of refinement and education to whose society he has access, and as, at the same time, you have a sweet face and an enormous power of will, it is not extraordinary that he should be completely under your influence."

"Don't you overrate that same influence, Stewart?" she asked, with a faint smile.

"No man knows better how to appraise the value of his own goods—and you are my goods, are you not, Harry, and out and away, the best of all my goods? Not that that's saying much. No; I understand these things, and I understand you, and having perfect confidence and trust in you, I stand by and watch the game."

"And you're never jealous, Stewart?" she asked, with a half laugh, but with the old expression of anxious interest in her eyes.

"Jealous, Harry? Not I, my love! I tell you, I have perfect trust and confidence in you, and I know your thorough devotion to our affairs. Let us get back to what we were talking about at first—what was it exactly?"

Her eyes had dropped again at the commencement of his reply, but she raised them as he finished speaking, and said, "We were discussing the amount of George Dallas's usefulness to us."

"Exactly. His usefulness is greater than it seems. There is nothing so useful in a life like ours as the outward semblance of position. I don't mean the mere get-up; that, most fools can manage; but the certain something which proclaims to his fellows and his inferiors that a man has had education and been decently bred. There are very few among our precious acquaintances who could not win Dallas's coat off his back, at cards, or billiards, or betting, but there is not one whom I could present to any young fellow of the smallest appreciation whom I might pick up. Even if their frightful appearance were not sufficiently against them—and it is—they would say or do something in the first few minutes which would awake suspicion, whereas Dallas, even in his poverty-stricken clothes of the last few weeks, looks like a gentleman, and talks and behaves like one."

"Yes," said Harriet, reflecting, "he certainly does; and that's a great consideration, Stewart!"

"Incalculable! Besides, though he is a thorough gambler at heart, he has some other visible profession. His 'connection with the press,' as he calls it, seems really to be a fact; he could earn a decent salary if he stuck to it. From a letter he showed me, I make out that they seem to think well of him at the newspaper office; and mind you, Harriet, he might be uncommonly useful to us some day in getting things kept out of the papers, or flying a few rumors which would take effect in the money market or at Tattersall's. Do you see all that, Harry?"

"I see it," she replied; "I suppose you're right."

"Right? Of course I am! George Dallas is the best ally—and the cheapest—we have ever had, and he must be kept with us."

"You harp upon that 'kept with us.' Are you still so persuaded that he wishes to shake us off?"

"I am. I feel convinced, from that little outburst to night, that he is touched by this unexplained sacrifice on the part of his mother, and that in his present frame of mind he would give anything to send us adrift and get back into decent life. I feel this so strongly, Harriet," continued Routh, rising from his seat, crossing to the mantel-shelf, and taking a cigar, "that I think even your influence would be powerless to restrain him, unless—"

"Unless what? Why do you pause?" she asked, looking up at him with a clear, steadfast gaze.

"Unless," said Routh, slowly puffing at his newly-lighted cigar, "unless we get a fresh and a firm hold on him. He will pay that hundred and forty pounds. Once paid, that hold is gone, and with it goes our ally!"

"I see what you mean," said Harriet, after a pause, with a short, mirthless laugh. "He must be what they call in the East 'compromised.' We are plague-stricken. George Dallas must be seen to brush shoulders with us. His garments must be known to have touched ours! Then the uninfected will cast him out, and he will be reduced to herd with us!"

"You are figurative, Harry, but forcible; you have hit my meaning exactly." But the main point still remains—how is he to be 'compromised?'"

"It is impossible to settle that hurriedly," she replied, pushing her hair back from her forehead. "But it must be done effectually, and the step which he is led to take, and which is to bind him firmly to us, must be irrevocable. Hush! Come in!"

These last words were in reply to a knock at the room door. A dirty servant girl put her tangled head into the room, and announced "Mr. Deane" as waiting down stairs. This statement was apparently incorrect, for the girl had scarcely made it before she disappeared, as though pulled back, and a man stepped past her and made one stride into the middle of the room, where he stood looking round him with a suspicious leer.

He was a young man, apparently not more than two or three-and-twenty, judging by his figure and his light, active movements; but cunning and deceit had stamped such wrinkles round his eyes, and graven such lines round his mouth, as are seldom to be seen in youth. His eyes, of a greenish-gray hue, were small and deeply sunk in his head; his cheek-bones were high, his cheeks fringed by a very small scrap of whisker running into a dirt-colored tuft of hair growing underneath his chin. His figure was tall and angular, his arms and legs long and awkward, his hands and feet large and ill-shaped. He wore a large thick overcoat with broad fur collar and cuffs, and a hood (also fur-lined) hanging back on his shoulders. With the exception of a very slight strip of ribbon, he had no cravat underneath his loug limp turnover collar, but stuck into his shirt-front was a large and handsome diamond pin.

"Why, what the 'tarnal," he commenced, placing his arms akimbo and without removing his hat—"what the 'tarnal, as they say down west, is the meaning of this little game? I come here pretty smart often, don't I? I come in gen'lly right way, don't I? Why does that gal go totin' up in front of me to-day to see if you would see me, now?"

"Some mistake—eh?"

"Not a bit of it! Gal was all right, gal was. What I want to know is, what was up? Was you a practisin' any of your little hankey-pankeys with the pasteboards? Was you a bitin' in a double set of scrip of the new company to do your own riggin' of the market? Or was it a little bit of quiet connubiality with the mar-darm here in which you didn't want to be disturbed?"

"Stewart Routh's face had been growing darker and darker as this speech proceeded, and at the allusion to his wife his lips began to move; but they were stopped by warning pressure underneath the table from Harriet's foot.

"You're a queer fellow, Deane!" he said, in a subdued voice.

"The fact is, we have a new servant here, and she did not recognize you as l'ami de la maison, and so stood on the proprieties, I suppose."

"O, that's it—eh? I don't know about the proprieties; but when the gal knows more of me, she'll guess I'm one of 'em. Nothing improper about me—no loafin' rowdy ways such as some of your friends have. Pay my way as I go, ask no favors, and don't expect none." He gave his trousers-pocket a ringing slap as he spoke, and looked round with a sneering laugh.

"There, there! It's all right; now sit down, and have a glass of wine, and tell us the news."

"No," he said, "thank'ee. I've been liquoring up in the city, where I've been doin' a little business—realizing some of them Lake Eries and Michigans as I told you on. Spanking investments they were, and have turned up trumps."

"I hope you're in the hands of an honest broker," said Routh. "I could introduce you to one who—"

"Thank'ee, I have a great man to broke for me, recommended to me from t'other side by his cousin who leads Wall street, New York City. I have given him the writings, and am going to see him on Tuesday, at two, when I shall trouser the dollars to the tune of fifteen thousand and odd, if markets hold up, I reckon."

"And you'll bring some of that to us in Tokenhouse-yard," said Routh, eagerly. "You recollect what I showed you, that I—"

"O, yes!" said Deane, again with the sinister smile. "You could talk a 'coon's hind leg off, you could, Routh. But I shall just keep my dollars in my desk for a few days. Tokenhouse-yard can wait a little, can't it? just to see how things eventuate, you know."

"As you please," said Routh. "One thing is certain, Deane; you need no Mentor in your business, whatever you may do in your pleasures."

"Flatter myself, need none in neither," said the young man, with a baleful grin. "Eh, look here, now; talking of pleasures, come and dine with me on Friday at Barton's, at five. I've asked Dallas, and we'll have a night of it. Tuesday, the 17th, mind. Sorry to take your husband away, Mrs. R., but I'll make up for it some day. Perhaps you'll come and dine with me some day, Mrs. R., without R., without R.?"

"Not I, Mr. Deane," said Harriet, with a laugh. "You're by far too dangerous a man."

Mr. Deane was gone; and again Stewart Routh sat over the table, scribbling figures on his blotting-pad.

"What are you doing, Stewart?"

"Five dollars to the pound—fifteen thousand," he said, "three thousand pounds! When did he say he would draw it?"

"On Tuesday, the—the day you dine with him.

"The day I dine with him! Keep it in his desk, he said, for few a days! He has grown very shy about Tokenhouse-yard. He hasn't been there for a week. The day I dine with him!" He had dropped his pen, and slowly passed his hand over his chin.

"Stewart," said Harriet, going behind him and putting her arm round his neck—"Stewart, I know what you're busy with, but—"

"Do you, Harry?" said he, disengaging himself, but not unkindly—"do you? Then keep it to yourself, my girl, and get to bed. We must have that, Harry, in one way or another; we must have it."

She took up a candle, pressed her lips to his forehead, and went to her room without a word. But for full ten minutes she remained standing before the dressing-table buried in thought, and again she muttered to herself, "A great risk! a great risk!"

CHAPTER V.

GOING DOWN.

On the evening of the day appointed for the dinner, Mr. Philip Deane stood on the steps of Barton's restaurant in the Strand, in anything but a contented frame of mind. His face, never too frank or genial in its expression, was puckered and set in rigid lines; his right hand was perpetually diving into his waistcoat-pocket for his watch, to which he constantly referred; while, with a slight stick which he carried in his left, he kept striking his leg in an irritable and irritating manner.

Mr. Deane had cause for annoyance; it was a quarter past seven, and neither of the guests whom he had invited had as yet appeared, though the dinner had been appointed for seven sharp. Crowds of men were pouring into and out of the restaurant, the first hungry and expectant, the last placid and replete; and Mr. Deane envied the first for what they were about to receive, and the last for what they had received. Moreover, the intended diners had in several cases pushed against him with scant ceremony; and Mr. Deane was not accustomed to be pushed against; while the people who had dined eyed him, as they stood on the steps lighting their cigars, with something like compassion, and Mr. Deane was unused to be pitied. So he stood there fretting and fuming, and biting his lips and flicking his legs, until his shoulders were grasped by George Dallas, who said:

"My dear Deane! a thousand apologies for being so late! Not my own fault, I protest!"

"Never is, of course," said Mr. Deane.

"Really it was not in this instance. I went round to the Mercury office to look at some proofs, and they kept me to do an article on a subject which I had had the handling of before, and which—"

"No one else could handle arter you, eh? Pretty tall opinion you newspaper-writin' fellows have of yourselves! And why didn't you bring Routh with you when you did come?"

"Routh? I haven't seen him for three days. Isn't he here?"

"Not he! I've been coolin' myself on this a'mighty old doorstep since seven o'clock, only once goin' inside just to look round the saloon, and I've not set eyes on him yet."

"How very odd!"

"So very odd, that I'll see him somethingest before I wait for him any longer! Come you in with me. I took a table right slick opposite the door, and we'll go and strike up at once."

He turned on his heel as he spoke, and walked up the passage into the large coffee-room of the restaurant. Dallas, who followed him closely, noticed him pause for an instant before one of the looking-glasses in the passage, put his hat a little more on one side, and throw open the folds of his fur-lined coat. Beneath this noticeable garment Mr. Deane wore a large baggy suit of black, an open-worked shirt-front with three large diamond studs in it, a heavy gold watch chain. There was a large diamond ring on the little finger of each hand. Thus tastefully attired, Mr. Deane, swaggering easily up the centre of the coffee-room and slapping his leg with his stick as he went, at length stopped at a vacant table, and clinked a knife against a tumbler.

"Now, waiter! Just look smart and slippy, and bring up our dinner right away. One of my friends is here, and I'm not a goin to wait for the other. He must take his chance, he must; but bring up ours at once, d'ye hear. Why what on airth is this?"

"This" was a boy of about twelve years of age, with a dirty face and grimy hands, with an old peakless cap on its head, and a very shiny, greasy, ragged suit on its back. "This" seemed to have been running hard, and was out of breath, and was very hot and damp in the face. Following Mr. Deane's glance, the waiter's eyes lighted on "this," and that functionary immediately fell into wrathful vernacular.

"Hallo! what are you doing here?" said he. "Come, you get out of this, d'ye hear?"

"I hear," said the boy, without moving a muscle. "Don't you flurry yourself in that way often, or you'll bust! And what a go that'd be! You should think of your precious family, you should!"

"Will you—"

"No, I won't, and that's all about it. Here, guv'nor,"—to Deane,—"you're my pitch; I've brought this for you." As he said this, the boy produced from his pocket a bit of string, a pair of musical bones, and a crumpled note, and handed the latter to Deane, who stepped aside to the nearest gas-jet to read it. To the great indignation of the waiter, the boy sat himself down on the edge of a chair, and, kicking his legs to and fro, surveyed the assembled company with calm deliberation. He appeared to be taking stock generally of everything round him. Between his dirty finger and thumb he took up a corner of the dinner-cloth, then he passed his hand lightly over Dallas's overcoat, which was lying on an adjacent chair. This gave the waiter his chance of bursting out again.

"Leave that coat alone, can't you? Can't you keep your fingers off things that don't belong to you?"

"Never mind, old cock! P'r'aps you'd like my card, but I've 'appened to come out without one. But you can have my name and address—they're wery haristocratic, not such as you're used to. Jim Swain's my name—Strike-a-light Jem—60, Fullwood's-rents. Now, tell me who's your barber!"

The waiter, who had a head as bald as a billiard-ball, was highly incensed at this remark (which sent some young men at an adjoining table into roars of laughter), and he would probably have found some means of venting his wrath, had not a sharp exclamation from Deane called off his attention.

"Get up dinner, waiter, at once, and clear off this third place, d'ye hear? The other gentleman aint comin'. Now, boy, what are you waiting for?"

"No answer to go back, is there, guv'nor?"

"Answer? No; none."

"All right. Shall I take that sixpence of you now, or will you give it me to-morrow? Short reck'nings is my motter. So if you're goin' to give it, hand it over."

Unable to resist a smile, Deane took a small coin from his purse and handed it to the boy, who looked at it, put it in his pocket, nodded carelessly to Deane and Dallas, and departed, whistling loudly.

"Routh is not coming, I suppose?" said Dallas, as they seated themselves at the table.

"No; he has defected, like a cussed skunk as he is, after giving me the trouble to order his dinner, which I shall have to pay for all the same. Regular riles me, that does, to be put in the hole for such a one-horse concern as Mr. Routh. He ought to know better than to play such tricks with me."

"Perhaps he is compelled to absent himself. I know—"

"Compelled! That might do with some people, but it won't nohow do with me. I allow no man to put a rudeness on me. Mr. Routh wants more of me than I do of him, as I'll show him before long. He wants me to come to his rooms to-morrow night—that's for his pleasure or profit, I guess, not mine—just depends on the humor I'm in. Now, here's the dinner. Let's get at it at once. There's no screwin' nor scrapin' in the ordering of it, and you can just give Routh a back-hander next time you see him by telling him how much you liked it."

Deane unfolded his table-napkin with a flourish, and cleared a space in front of him for his plate. There was an evil expression on his face; a mordant, bitter, savage expression, which Dallas did not fail to remark. However, he took no notice of it, and the conversation during dinner was confined to ordinary commonplaces.

Mr. Deane had not boasted without reason; the dinner was excellent, the wines were choice and abundant, and with another kind of companion George Dallas would have enjoyed himself. But even in the discussion of the most ordinary topics, there was a low coarseness in Deane's conversation, a vulgar self-sufficiency and delight at his own shrewdness, a miserable mistrust of every one, and a general arrogance and conceit which were highly nettling and repulsive. During dinner, these amiable qualities displayed themselves in Mr. Deane's communication with the waiter: it was not until the cloth had been removed, and they were taking their first glass of port, that Deane reverted to what had annoyed him before they sat down.

"That Routh's what they call a mean cuss, t'other side the water," he commenced; "a mean cuss he is, and nothing else. Throwing me over in this way at the last minute, and never sending word before, so that I might have said we shall only be two instead of three, and saved paying for him! He thinks he's cruel wide awake, he does; but though he's been at it all his life, and it's not six months since I first caught sight of this little village nominated London, I don't think there's much he could put me up to now!"

He looked so expectant of a compliment, that Dallas felt bound to say, "You certainly seem to have made the most of your time!"

"Made the most of my time? I reckon I have! Why, there's no s'loon, oyster cellar, dancing-shop, night-house of any name at all, where I'm not regular well known. 'Here's the Yankee,' they say, when I come in; not that I'm that, but I've told 'em I hail from the United States, and that's why they call me the Yankee. They know me, and they know I pay my way as I go, and that I've got plenty of money. Help yourself—good port this, aint it?—ought to be, for they charge eight shillings a bottle for it. Why, people on t'other side the water, sir, they think I'm staying in titled country-houses, and dining in Portland Place, and going to hear oratorios. I've got letters of introduction in my desk which would do all that, and more. Never mind! I like to shake a loose leg, and, as I flatter myself I can pretty well take care of myself, I shake it!"

"Yes," said Dallas, in a slightly bitter tone, with a vivid recollection of his losses at cards to Deane; "yes, you can take care of yourself!"

"Rather think so!" repeated Deane, with a jarring laugh. "There are two things which are guiding principles with me: number one, never to lend a dollar to any man; number two, always to have the full value of every dollar I spend. If you do that, you'll generally find yourself not a loser in the end. We'll have another bottle of this eight-shilling port. I've had the value of this dinner out of you, recollect, so that I'm not straying from my principle. Here, waiter, another bottle of this eight-shilling wine!"

"You're a lucky fellow, Deane," said George Dallas, slowly finishing his second glass of the fresh bottle; "you're a lucky fellow, to have plenty of money and to be your own master, able to choose your own company, and do as you like. I wish I had the chance!" As Dallas spoke, he filled his glass again.

"Well, there are worse berths than mine in the ship, and that's a fact!" said Deane, calmly. "I've often thought about you, Dallas, I have now, and I've often wondered when you'll be like the prodigal son, and go home to your father, and succeed the old man in the business."

"I have no father!"

"Hain't you though? But you've got some friends, I reckon, who are not over delighted at your campin' out with the wild Injuns you're living among at present?"

"I have a mother."

"That's a step towards respectability. I suppose you'll go back to the old lady, some day, and be welcomed back with open arms?"

"There's some one else to have a say in that matter. My mother is—is married again. I have a step-father."

"Not generally a pleasant relation, but no reason why you shouldn't help yourself to this eight-shilling wine. That's right; pass the bottle. A step-father, eh? And he and you have collided more than once, I expect?"

"Have what?"

"Collided."

"Do you mean come into collision?"

"Expect I do," said Deane, calmly.

"I'm forbidden the house. I'm looked upon as a black sheep—a pest—a contamination."

"But the old gentleman wouldn't catch anything from you. They don't take contamination easy, after fifty!"

"O, it's not for himself that Mr. Carruthers is anxious; he is infliction proof—he— What is the matter?"

"Matter? Nothing! What name did you say?"

"Carruthers—Capel Carruthers. Country family down in Kent."

"Go ahead!" said Deane, tossing off his wine, refilling his glass, and pushing the bottle to his companion; "and this old gentleman is not anxious about himself, you say; where is your bad influence likely to fall, then?"

"On his niece, who lives with them."

"What's her name?"

"Clare. Clare Carruthers! Isn't it a pretty name?"

"It is so, sir! And this niece. What's she like, now?"

George Dallas tried to throw a knowing gleam into his eyes, which the perpetual motion of the decanter had rendered somewhat bleared and vacant as he looked across at his companion, and said, with a half laugh, "You seem to take a great interest in my family, Deane?"

Not one whit discomposed, Philip Deane replied, "Study of character as a citizen of the world, and a general desire to hear what all gals are like. Is Miss Clare pretty?"

"I've only seen her once, and that not too clearly. But she struck me as being lovely."

"Lovely, eh? And the old man won't have you at any price? That's awkward, that is!"

"Awkward!" said Dallas, in a thick voice, "it's more than awkward, as he shall find! I'll be even with him—I'll—Hallo! What do you want, intruding on gentlemen's conversation?"

"Beg pardon, sir," said the waiter, to whom this last remark was addressed; "no offence, gentlemen, but going to shut up now! We ain't a supper-house, gentlemen, and it's going on for twelve o'clock."

Indeed, all the other tables were vacated, so Deane rose at once and paid the bill which the waiter had laid before him. Dallas rose too with a staggering step.

"Coat, sir," said the waiter, handing it to him; "other arm, sir, please; gently does it, sir; that's it!" And with some little difficulty he pulled the coat on; George Dallas cursing it, and the country tailor who had made it, as he stood rocking uneasily on his heels and glaring vacantly before him.

"Come along, old horse," said Deane; "you'll be fixed as firm as Washington Capitol when we get into the air. Come along, and we'll go and finish the night somewhere!"

So saying, he tucked his companion's arm firmly within his own, and they sallied forth.

Impervious to Bullets from Needle-Guns.—There are practical jokers who take a special pleasure in mystifying journalists. The editor of the Nord published an account of some wonderful cloth, the invention of one Bernard, which rendered the wearer impervious to bullets from needle-guns or rifles of any other kind. M. Bernard posted himself at one hundred yards' distance—"a long shot, Sir Sucius, if you love me"—and, thus draped in his textile æs triplex, gave the word, "Make ready, present, fire!" Flash went the bullet, and sped with unerring aim. The spectators stood horror-struck. Bernard was not quite as immovable as the mountain which bears his name, but quite as invulnerable. He staggered, but quickly recovered, picked up the bullet, and tossed it back, as in the incantation scene of Der Freischutz. The editor of the Nord carefully inspected the bullet, which was slightly flattened; but he was the flat, for whilst he was inspecting the missile, M. Bernard was laughing in his sleeve of armor at his dupe. He had stood fire only against a cork. The indented bullet was a prepared one taken from his pocket.

There's always one consolation, whatever our misfortune—it might be worse. Were life hanging on a thread, it would be a comfort to think that it was not hanging on a rope.

Air is food of which one eats continually; therefore to be good it ought always to be fresh.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications.]

WHEN we find a Presbyterian clergyman taking up the battle-ax in defense of cards, dominoes, billiards, theatres, etc., we are strongly reminded of the fact that we are living in a progressive age. Twenty years ago, a Presbyterian minister who should have dared to lift his voice in favor of "worldly amusements," would soon have become the subject of the ecclesiastical discipline. But the world moves on. The Rev. Martin R. Vincent, of Troy, N. Y., formerly the colleague of the celebrated Dr. Beman, has come out in the boldest style as a champion of all recreations and amusements that are intrinsically blameless. Mr. Vincent insists that amusements of the class ordinarily designated as "worldly," are not only harmless, but that they are necessary to a healthy and fully developed Christian life. He insists that Christians are not to avoid the world in order to keep themselves pure, like monks and nuns, but to place themselves in contact with the world that they may purify it. Furthermore, that amusements are absolutely necessary to mental and physical health; and that it is the duty of Christians to furnish them to their children in such a shape and with such surroundings as to divest them of the dangerous associations that at present too generally accompany them. The following extracts from the Rev. gentleman's essay upon Religion and Amusement, read before the International Convention of Young Men's Christian Associations, at Albany, N. Y., in June last, will serve to show how far even so conservative a body as the Presbyterians is influenced by the inevitable "spirit of the age:"

CARDS, BILLIARDS, DANCING, ETC.

"It is innocent for boys to play marbles, but sinful to play dominoes. Wherein, pray? They can learn to gamble with one as well as with the other. It is sinful to play billiards, but highly graceful and innocent to play croquet. But why? Really, when it comes to a comparison, the first is infinitely the more beautiful and intellectual game. The ethical distinctions are positively bewildering between balls of ivory and balls of wood; between mallets and cues; between green baize and green grass. A Christian household must not sit down and play at whist, but they are engaged in a Christian and laudable manner if they spend an evening over Dr. Busby or Master Rodbury cards. Really, it is hard to draw the moral line between cards bearing aces and spades, and cards with the likenesses of Dr. Busby's son and servant, Doll the dairymaid, and the like. When it comes to a question of profit, one is an amusement involving a good deal of healthy mental exertion, while the other is about as silly and profitless a way of spending an evening as can well be imagined. Youth must not dance, but they may march to music in company and go through calisthenic exercises involving a good deal more motion than dancing. But if people may march to music and be guiltless, it is very hard to see how skipping to music converts the exercise into sin. It is said that the associations make the difference; but the advocate of this theory is shut up to proving that the associations are inseparable from the amusements. And here is the place to remark that the best amusements are the ones most likely to be abused—the ones which experience shows are most abused, and about which cluster the most evil associations. The children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light. Men do not care to counterfeit a coin of inferior value; and the world is very clear-sighted to discern the best and richest sources of worldly pleasure, and utterly unscrupulous in appropriating them entirely to itself. The amusements which are most abused are commonly those which, from their intrinsic value, call most loudly upon virtue to rescue them from their abuses."

REVIVALS AND AMUSEMENTS.

In reply to certain objections to amusements made by some of the pious of the "stricter sort," the Troy minister keenly observes:

"It has been said, I know, that in proportion as the church or individuals are engaged in religious efforts, the desired for amusements declines, the implication being that a desire for amusements characterizes only a low state of religion. This deduction is entirely unwarranted, and the process by which it is reached is fallacious. It is true that in a season of deep religious interest in a church there will be less disposition to amusements. A special religious interest will draw men's minds from business as well as from pleasure; and the inference to the condemnation of business is just as legitimate as to that of amusement. Again, the statement is not borne out in the ordinary religious life of individuals. Many, very many of the best, most efficient, and most steadily growing Christians in the church exhibit habitually a keen relish for amusements, and for some which are most sternly condemned, and participate in them most heartily. And once more: while, at revival seasons in individual churches, a temporary decrease of amusements may be seen, the more impotant fact is that the aggregate of Christian society has been for many years past developing a steadily increasing interest in the subject, and a corresponding liberality of sentiment respecting it. Scores of Christian men have billiard tables in their houses. Colleges, from which in years past students would have been summarily expelled for rolling ten-pins, have now bowling alleys of their own. Even in the corridors of staid old Williams the sound of the balls may be heard; and the revival record of the college does not indicate that even this stupendous innovation has wrought to the banishment of the Spirit of God. The asserters of this inverse ratio between piety and amusement must, in short, dispose, as best they can, of the fact that along with the growth of Christian intelligence, Christian benevolence, and Christian activity, there has been developed in the church itself a growing sympathy with many of the very forms of amusement most condemned by the religious sentiment of an earlier age."

"BILLIARDS IN HEAVEN."

To the eminently orthodox style of argument illustrated in such queries as "Do you think we shall have checker-boards in heaven? Imagine Paul playing billiards! Do you suppose St. Peter would roll ten-pins?" Mr. Vincent responds:

"This is most unworthy trifling over a serious subject. The reasoning, if it be worthy the name, is simply this: Certain things appear incongruous with our ideas of the character and work of certain men; therefore these things are sinful. It is the easiest thing in the world to invent situations of this kind. Such men as Paul and Peter are associated in our minds with but one set of ideas—with one great, glorious, solemn work; and their association with any inferior matter affects us unpleasantly at first. Even when we think of Paul making tents, there is at first view something that clashes in our mind with the speech on Mars Hill, and the healing of the cripple at Lystra. But who thinks of disputing from this the propriety of Paul's own hands ministering to his own necessities? After all, if there is no sin in rolling ten-pins, I know not why Peter should not have participated in that very excellent and healthful recreation with as much propriety as any of the numerous ministers of the present day who 'roll' with so much zest and assiduity at our fashionable watering places. Think of Paul dancing! Well, think of him! Think of Paul wearing a blue swallow-tailed coat with brass buttons! How he would have looked under the shadow of the Acropolis, the winds of the Ægean gently swaying his cerulean skirts, and the eager faces of Stoic and Epicurean reflected in the bright buttons! Think of Peter skating; cutting figures of eight, and performing 'outer edge backwards!' Think of John in a white cravat; or of Bartholomew putting up seidlitz powders; or of Timothy running with a fire-engine! How would they have looked? Therefore hasten, ye trim gentlemen, to doff your guilty blue and brass, and don the toga. Lay aside your skates, boys; Peter would have looked very strangely skating, therefore it is sinful to skate. Tear off your white chokers, ye reverends, and throw away your pestles, ye apothecaries, and be like the apostles. Shall we have checker-boards in heaven? No, brother, I presume not. Neither shall we marry or be given in marriage; but pray don't condemn us to celibacy on that ground while we remain upon earth. 'Would you play chess on your death bed?' Probably not, my friend. Neither would I put on my boots, or do a great many other very innocent things. Death stands out in startling contrast to all our employments; to business and study as well as to recreation; and you would find it vastly inconvenient to act upon the principle that nothing must be done which you would not do on your death bed."

A JOYOUS CHRISTIANITY.

Our bold Trojan parson concludes his highly original essay as follows:

"I want for our youth a Christianity that shall not relax one iota of its obligation to God or to man; that shall bate not one jot from an entire consecration of heart and life to God; that shall walk closely with God, and feel as deeply as human weakness can feel, the necessity of watchfulness and of Divine care to keep it from temptation. I challenge any man to draw undue license from the principles I have asserted. But I want more joy brought ont of the world by Christians. I want the gospel carried boldly into some things from which it has been kept aloof. I want Christian life to be in the spirit more than in the letter. I do not plead for less but for more conformity to the spirit and teaching of Christ. Not for a lower but for a higher Christian life; for a wider application of gospel principles, a more implicit trust in the leavening power of truth; a more practical belief in the assertion that the weapons of our warfare are mighty through God to the pulling down of strong-holds. I want Christian conscience clothed with principles and not with dogmas. I want the word of God read and interpreted fairly, and that allowed which it allows. I protest against its being twisted and perverted into rules for the unnecessary abridgement of Christian liberty, where it lays down only general principles for the conscience. I want less of the religion that is 'Dark as a funeral scarf from stem to stern,' and more of that which is full of child-like trust in the love of God and the power of truth, and of freedom purged by love from license."

Longfellow, in one of his poems, represents himself, or some indefinite person, as asking some other indefinite person to read poetry to him, or, as he expresses his petition,

"And lend to the rhyme of the poet
The music of thy voice."

The imaginary petitioner further intimates that he is not in a mood to relish Homer, or Virgil, or Milton, or Dante, or anything in the heavy epic or tragic line, but that he wants something sweet, and simple, and unambitious:

"Not from the grand old poets,
The master bards sublime,
Whose distant footsteps echo
Through the corridors of Time:
But from some humbler poet," etc.

Now it is really quite refreshing in these days of exacting and scornful criticism, when it is the fashion to sneer at everything in art and literature that is not positively stunning—it is refreshing to have Longfellow's authority for the idea that there can be any poetry that it may be pleasant and profitable to read or hear read, except such as comes up to the loftiest standard of excellence. Among these "humbler poets," one of the sweetest, and purest, and most natural, is Alice Cary, whose "Ballads, Lyrics, and Hymns" have just been published in a remarkably elegant volume, by Hurd Houghton, of New York, a copy of which we have received from Chilion Beach, of 34 Montgomery street. The volume is about as creditable a specimen of typography as has ever issued from the American press. It is illustrated with a portrait of the author, and is printed on some superb and uncommon quality of paper, with the technical name of which we are unacquainted. Several of the hymns remind us of certain of Emilie Lawson's graver and more thoughtful pieces, though scarcely equal to them in an artistic point of view. We make room for a few specimens:

THE BRIDAL VEIL.

We're married, they say, and you think you have won me—
Well, take this white veil from my head, and look on me:
Here's matter to vex you, and matter to grieve you,
Here's doubt to distrust you, and faith to believe you—
I am all as you see, common earth, common dew;
Be wary, and mould me to roses, not rue!

Ah! shake out the filmy thing, fold after fold,
And see if you have me to keep and to hold—
Look close on my heart—see the worst of its sinning—
It is not yours to-day for the yesterday's winning—
The past is not mine—I am too proud to borrow—
You must grow to new heights if I love you to-morrow.

We're married! I'm plighted to hold up your praises,
As the turf at your feet does its handful of daisies;
That way lies my honor—my pathway of pride,
But, mark you, if greener grass grow either side,
I shall know it, and, keeping in body with you,
Shall walk in my spirit with feet on the dew!

We're married! O, pray that our love do not fail!
I have wings flattened down and hid under my veil:
They are subtle as light—you can never undo them,
And swift in their flight—you can never pursue them,
And spite of all clasping, and spite of all hands,
I can slip like a shadow, a dream, from your hands.

Nay, call me not cruel, and fear not to take me,
I am yours for my lifetime, to be what you make me—
To wear my white veil for a sign, or a cover,
As you shall be proven my lord, or my lover;
A cover for peace that is dead, or a token
Of bliss that can never be written or spoken.

THE UNWISE CHOICE.

Two young men, when I was poor,
Came and stood at my open door;

One said to me, "I have gold to give,"
And one, "I will love you while I live!"

My sight was dazzled; wo's the day!
And I sent the poor young man away;

Sent him away, I know not where,
And my heart went with him, unaware.

He did not give me any sighs,
But he left his picture in my eyes;

And in my eyes it has always been:
I have no heart to keep it in!

Beside the lane with hedges sweet,
Where we parted, never more to meet,

He pulled a flower of love's own hue,
And where it had been came out two!

And in th' grass where he stood, for years,
The dews of th' morning looked like tears.

Still smiles the house where I was born
Among its fields of wheat and corn.

Wheat and corn that strangers bind—
I reap as I sowed, and I sowed to th' wind.

As one who feels the truth break through
His dream, and knows his dream untrue,

I live where splendors shine, and sigh
For the peace that splendor cannot buy;

Sigh for the day I was rich, though poor,
And saw th' two young men at my door!

ONE DUST.

Thou, under Satan's fierce control,
Shall Heaven its final rest bestow?
I know not, but I know a soul
That might have fallen as darkly low.

I judge thee not, what depths of ill
Soe'er thy feet have found, or trod;
I know a spirit and a will
As weak, but for the grace of God.

Shalt thou with full day laborers stand,
Who hardly canst have pruned one vine?
I know not but I know a hand
With an infirmity like thine.

Shalt thou, who hast with scoffers part,
E'er wear the crown the Christian wears?
I know not, but I know a heart
As flinty, but for tears and prayers.

Have mercy, O Thou Crucified!
For even while I name Thy name,
I know a tongue that might have lied
Like Peter's, and am bowed with shame.

Fighters of good fights—just, unjust—
The weak who faint, the frail who fall—
Of one blood, of the self same dust,
Thou, God of love, hast made them all.

During the epidemic of intermittents in the West this season, the whole immense stock of Ayer's Ague Cure became exhausted, and the producing power of his Laboratory was found inadequate to meet the demand. Many who knew its extraordinary virtues for the cure of Chills and Fever, paid exorbitant prices for it to those who were fortunate enough to have a supply on hand. Some of our neighbors paid ten dollars for a bottle, while the regular price is but one, and assure us it was on the whole the cheapest remedy they could buy, even at that figure. They praise it for two qualities first, that it cures; and last, that it leaves the health unimpaired.—Iowa Standard.

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

WE are informed that divers of our bachelor friends, whose heads are softer than their hearts, have accused us of devoting too much space to the encouragement of the ladies in an undue attention to the matters of the toilet. This is far from our intention; but we do feel with a writer in Chambers' Journal, who says:

"There are certain moralists in the world who labor under the impression that it is no matter what people wear or how they put on their apparel. Such people cover themselves up—they do not dress. No one doubts that the mind is more important than the body, the jewel than the setting; and yet the virtue of the one and the brilliancy of the other is enhanced by the mode in which they are presented to the senses. Let a woman have every virtue under the sun, if she is slatternly, or even inappropriate in her dress, her merits will be more than half obscured. If, being young, she is dowdy or untidy, or being old, fantastic or slovenly, her mental qualifications stand a chance of being passed over with indifference or disgust."

These being our sentiments—and feeling that where our female missionaries have to labor in a field occupied by men who have been so long without the pale of civilizing influences, it is necessary for them to be armed at every point—we shall continue to give them our aid and encouragement in the way of suggestion for personal adornment.

COLLARS AND CUFFS.

Collars are still worn small, with long points in front. But a later style is large and square, like the yoke of a dress. The cuff to match this shape is large and pointed, or square and battlemented, and in any or either case profusely trimmed Elizabethan ruffles, slightly reduced in size, are also the rage in fashionable circles.

VEILS

Veils are but little worn this season. The newest style is eight-sided, with one half of the sides—which look like square scollops—embroidered in floss. The veil may be either of tulle or tissue, black or white, and the embroidery may be simple or elaborate, and in black and white combined.

JACKETS.

A plain dress may pass current even among handsome dresses by being worn with a neatly fitting or dainty little jacket, in a color that harmonizes or contrasts. Many styles are in vogue. A simple and pretty one is as follows: A white pique cut to fit the form loosely; two points in front, one at each side, and three behind, the points not being more than a finger deep. These are edged with a band of colored muslin, in pattern, say a lilac chain on a white ground. Four strips of the same are laid down the front, which are fastened with pearl buttons. One crosses each shoulder, and two or more form a cuff at the wrist. There are others in cashmere, with bright borders of embroidery, or strips of cashmere in crimson, green, and gold. Small crochet stars in black or white, set on pink or red ribbon at regular intervals, form a pretty and effective style of trimming. Another style equally as effective and one still easier to make, consists of little squares of black silk, fringed all around, and tacked on to strips of yellow, green, or red ribbon. A few beads or bugles of black glass or jet, forming a star or a cluster in the centre of each square, are a great improvement.

WHITE WAISTS.

The newest thing in the way of trimming for white waists is the application of Cluny lace, mounted on black ribbon-velvet, which is made separate from the bodice, and can be tacked on each time the bodice is "gotten up."

A pretty bodice with trimming of this style is called the Arion. It is a modification of the Garibaldi. The material is white muslin, with narrow tucks on every part except on the long sleeves. In order to render the laying on of the trimming an easy proceeding, it will be found the best plan to cut out a pattern of the high bodice in paper, and then to mark with a pencil the exact position of the trimmings. The bodice is fastened down the front with small mother-of-pearl studs, and four black velvet rosettes are added to conceal them. The back is ornamented to correspond with the front. The trimmings covering the shoulder seams are placed over the bretelles, or braces, and those which form the epaulettes underneath them. A narrow standing collar encircles the throat, and is finished off in front with a black velvet bow. The long sleeves are of plain muslin, and the trimmings are laid on to simulate gauntlet cuffs. The waistband is made of velvet ribbon two inches and a half wide, and is fastened with a mother-of-pearl and jet buckle. This pretty bodice might, if approved, be trimmed with either blue or pink ribbon instead of black velvet. The bows must, of course, match the lining to the lace. Fine Nainsook muslin is the best material for these bodices when they are to be tucked, as the thin book muslin does not look so well when washed.

NOVELTIES IN BOOTS AND SHOES.

Boots of the Polish shape are very much worn in Paris, made of a small black and white checked silk, the check on close inspection not being formed by straight lines crossing each other, but by a minute diaper of black and white, which has the effect of check. A deep golosh of kid is placed round the boot, which buttons on one side of the front, and is finished with tassels. These are very pretty for morning wear in a carriage.

Polish boots in various colors of satin turc, fastened with self colored enamelled buttons, are in good taste, and would be, of course, selected to correspond with the toilet.

House shoes in brown holland finely embroidered with sprigs of flowers in colored purse silk in the Grover & Baker Machine stitch, and trimmed with Cluny lace over ribbon, and full rosettes to match the color of the flowers, are decided novelties. Many black gros grain shoes are similarly worked, and others dotted with jet, steel, or crystal beads. A number of very pretty morning house shoes are made in coutil, and some black gros grain shoes are trimmed with straw.

BEDDING AND BED-LINEN.

Large square pillow-cases, with the initials of the owner embroidered in white floss or twist in the centre, and surrounded by a wreath of leaves and flowers likewise worked in white floss or twist. The letter or letters employed are very ornamental, and are each as large as a lady's hand. The wreath may be elaborate, but not so much so as to be more conspicuous than the lettering.

Blankets, thick, soft, and luxurious, are likewise marked in large initials, and into these colors may be introduced with fitness and effect. The brightest and best of silk floss and Berlin wool may here be employed with advantage.

White spreads should be marked to correspond with the pillow-cases, the letters and wreath proportionately larger and more elaborate.

The centre of each article—instead of, as heretofore, the corner—is the place decreed for the display. Only in towels is the corner now used for marking, and even on these the most instead of the least possible space is devoted to it. It is not the mode to use the whole name in marking, but when it is done the initials are made large and elaborate, and the other letters of the name are worked inside them in a way as little conspicuous as possible—as if they were something to be ashamed of.

SPIRADELLA.

WHY SWEET MUSIC PRODUCES SADNESS.

SWEET music, says Leigh Hunt—that is to say, "sweet," in the sense in which it is evidently used in the following passage—something not of a mirthful character, but yet not of a melancholy one—does not always produce sadness; but it does often, even when the words, if it be vocal music, are cheerful. We do not presume to take for granted that the reason we are about to differ with, or perhaps rather to extend, is Shakspeare's own, or that he would have stopped thus short if speaking in his own person, though he has given it the air of an abstract remark; but "Lorenzo," in the Merchant of Venice, says that it is because our "spirits are attentive."

"I'm never merry when I hear sweet music," says pretty Jessica. "The reason is, your spirits are attentive," says her lover:

> "For do but note a wild and wanton herd,
> Or race of youthful and unbandled colts,
> Fetching mad sounds, bellowing and neighing loud,
> Which is the hot condition of their blood;
> If they but hear perchance a trumpet sound,
> Or any air of music touch their ears,
> You shall perceive them make a mutual stand,
> Their savage eyes turned to a modest gaze,
> By the sweet power of music."

How beautiful! But with the leave of this young and most elegant logician, his reason is, at least, not sufficient; for how does it account for our being moved, even to tears, by music which is not otherwise melancholy! All attention, it is true, implies a certain degree of earnestness, and all earnestness has a mixture of seriousness; yet seriousness is not the prevailing character of attention in all instances; for we are attentive to fine music, whatever its character; and sometimes it makes us cheerful, and even mirthful. The giddier portion of Rossini's music does not make us sad; nor is sadness the general consequence of hearing dances or even marches.

And yet again, on the other hand, in the midst of any of this music, even of the most light and joyous, our eyes will sometimes fill with tears. How is this?

The reason surely is, that we have an instinctive sense of the fugitive and perishing nature of all sweet things—of beauty, of youth, of life; of all those fair shows of the world, of which music seems to be the voice, and of whose transitory nature it reminds us most when it is most beautiful, because it is then we must regret our mortality.

We do not, it is true, say this to ourselves. We are not conscious of the reason, that is to say, we do not feel it with knowingness; but we do feel it, for the tears are moved. And how many exquisite criticisms of tears and laughter do not whole audiences make at plays, though not one man in fifty will be able to put down his reasons for it on paper!

LADIES will find at Meagher Tauffe & Co., No, 9 Montgomery street, an endless variety of new Fall and Winter styles of dress goods, purchased at auction sales, and offered at surprising low rates. See advertisement on 16th page of to-day's paper. *

AMUSEMENTS.

AT Maguire's Opera House this afternoon's and evening's performances of Pauvrette—reported to be most handsomely placed on the stage—will complete the fifth week of the unabated and almost unequaled success of Miss Alice Kingsbury. The only other novelty produced during the week was Joe Jefferson's version of Dickens' Christmas story, The Cricket on the Hearth, played in an unusually excellent manner. Miss Kingsbury's "Dot" was characterized with a good share of that feeling and pathos which so endears the character to the reader of the story. Mrs. Jackson gave to the difficult part of blind "Bertha" a very expressive rendition; and Mrs. Judah as the clumsy and bungling nurse, "Tilly Sloboy," who is constantly endangering the fragile life of baby Dot, invested the part with that degree of eccentric exaggeration which is so characteristic of Dickens' humorous characters. Mr. McCullough played the honest, out-spoken "John Peerybingle" very creditably indeed. Anderson's "Caleb Plummer" was a most excellent interpretation of that character; and Coad, too, as "Tackleton," the miser, gave a good rendition of that ungrateful part. The two "Crickets" have been the most successful pieces produced during Miss Kingsbury's engagement, and both are played with unusual ability and excellence.

Stage Manager Graves, who has very ably filled that position for years at the Opera House, is to have a benefit on Monday night; when a new piece, now playing with great popularity in the East, at New York and elsewhere, by Eddy, Edwin Adams, Henrietta Irvin and others, who are starring in it, entitled Rocambole, or the Knave of Hearts, will be produced for the first time in California. The play is a copyrighted French translation, and is said to possess both sensation and merit. Miss Kingsbury holds the right to produce it in California, and has kindly gave Mr. Graves its first night for his benefit, as well as volunteered her services, as a token of her appreciation of his professional services.

The record of the pieces played next week will be found in advertisement of the Opera House on our last page.

AT THE METROPOLITAN the Howson Troupe have been playing their admirably acted burlesque, Aladdin, or the Wonderful Scamp, and other musical pieces, during the week. Mr. W. Edouin, a young and versatile actor lately from Australia, has been added to the troupe, who has shown a very high standard of talent in burlesque, and pantominic and acrobatic acting, in the two parts he has played in Aladdin, and Satanus. He bids fair to excel any young actor we have at present on the boards, and would be a most valuable addition to any company. Miss Clelia Howson has also given some unmistakable evidences of possessing rare talent for burlesque acting. The Bee and the Orange Flower is the latest novelty by the Howsons.

THE RAVEL-MARTINETTI TROUPE are on the steamer due to-morrow, under engagement to Managers Birrell & Co. of the Metropolitan, and will probably open with the Green Monster during the coming week. They bring a very extensive repertoire of new pieces, and we bespeak for them a prosperous season.

MRS. J. MAGUIRE will be the recipient of a complimentary benefit at Platt's Hall, on Monday evening.

A GOOD "HIT" FOR SAN FRANCISCO.—The reason why children die, (says Hall's Journal of Health, very good authority in this instance, though not by any means universally reliable,) is because they are not properly taken care of. From the day of birth, they are stuffed with improper food, choked with physic, suffocated in hot rooms, steamed in bed-clothes. So much for in-door. When permitted to breathe a breath of pure air once a week in summer, and once or twice during the colder months, only the nose is permitted to peer into daylight. A little later, they are sent out with no clothes at all on the parts which most need protection. Bare legs, bare arms, bare necks, girted middles, with an inverted umbrella to collect the air, and chill the other parts of the body. A stout, strong man goes out in a cold day with gloves and overcoat, woolen stockings, and thick double-soled boots, with cork between and rubbers over. The same day a child three years old, an infant in flesh, and blood, and bone, and constitution, goes out with hose as thin as paper, cotton socks, legs uncovered to the knees, neck bare; an exposure which would disable the nurse, kill the mother outright, and make the father an invalid for weeks. And why? To harden them to a mode of dress which they are never expected to practice. To accustom them to exposure, which, a dozen years later, would be considered downright foolery. To rear children thus for the slaughter-pen, and then lay it to the Lord, is too bad We don't think the Almighty had any hand in it. And to draw comfort from the presumption that He has an agency in the death of the child, is a presumption and a profanation.

THE LAST BATTLE OF WINCHESTER.

IT was just high noon, September 19th, 1864, when the bugle sounded the advance. The line moved forward simultaneously, in the order specified, so that the Rebels might be engaged at all points. The Second division moved in gallant style straight through the woods into the clearing beyond, and over this clearing, some two hundred yards in width, the line rushed forward in a bayonet charge. My own brigade was at this moment moving up through the wood, and had made but little progress through it when the enemy's artillery opened from the Winchester hills, throwing a torrent of shells directly into this wood. The terrible missiles crashed downward through the branches, sending splinters and fragments flying through the brigade. The officers drew their swords and shouted sternly to the men to keep the line straight. Three of these shells fell directly in front of my regiment—the first killing the Colonel's horse, the second the Major's, without injuring either of those officers; and the third exploded directly before my own company.

A heavy fragment struck the corporal at my elbow, literally demolishing him; three other men were hurled senseless to the ground, more or less injured, and a smaller piece ripped the right sleeve of my blouse from wrist to elbow, tearing the flesh of the arm in its progress. There is a kind of excitement in such a moment which can entirely overcome slight pain. I grasped the arm in several places with the other hand, to make sure that no bones were injured, and while the deep, nervous tension of the next three hours lasted, I hardly felt that I was wounded. It grew painful enough before night; but that was after the battle had been fought and won, and when nature could be no longer slighted.

The brigade moved steadily on, while the screaming of shells filled the air with its dismal noise, and the sharp whizzing of rifle balls began to mingle with the sound. Over toward the left, but beyond our sight, a tremendous uproar of musketry, with quick and savage discharges of artillery, told us that the Sixth corps was at work. The woods in our immediate vicinity rang with the shouts of our officers, emphasized by the explosion of shells and the singing of bullets all about us.

All this time we could see nothing of the Second division, for the woods which we were traversing were dense, and the lines were entirely hidden from our view. We supposed them heavily engaged, from the fire which we, in their rear, were encountering, but the truth, the disastrous truth, was not revealed for ten minutes longer. General Dwight had ridden with several of his staff out to the edge of this wood, and watched the movement of the Second, in order to be prepared with his own command for any event which might happen; and he afterward described Grover's advance as spirited in the extreme. With a ringing cheer, and led by general and field officers on horseback, the division went at double-quick across the clearing, and disappeared into the opposite wood. A roar of musketry, sounding in a thunderous burst of volleys, pealed up from that wood, and smoke and flame streamed out in a long line as though the whole forest had been suddenly ignited. There was a brief, bloody and desperate encounter, a crossing of bayonets and an incessant crash of rifles—and then the Second division was hurled back into the clearing, stunned, mangled and shattered, emerging from its conflict with the whole left wing of Early's army! The Rebels were massed in those woods in deep columns, against which Grover's command was broken as a mighty billow is broken upon the rock. Our regiments were in many cases disorganized with heavy losses in killed, wounded and prisoners, and were driven out of the wood by the exultant host which peopled it; and over the same clearing which had witnessed its gallant charge ten minutes before, the division fell back by scattered regiments, the lines of the enemy pressing close after it, sending volley after volley through its decimated and bleeding ranks, and capturing scores of prisoners.

This was the threatening disaster which Dwight witnessed from the edge of the wood, and which devolved upon him the holding of the entire right until the discomfited Second could be rallied and again brought in position. At the point where he had ridden into the clearing, an angle of the wood extended out into it, leaving less than two hundred yards between it and the position of the Rebels. My regiment, at the head of Beale's brigade, was advancing straight toward it through an increasing storm of balls and shells which were making their deadly marks upon the ranks. The uproar at this point was terrific. So much noise in the front of a battle as was heard among those trees, it has rarely been my lot to hear. A voice—Dwight's, I suppose—shouted to General Beale:

"Throw one of your regiments straight to the front, beyond that point—we must hold it, at all hazards."

The stentorian tones of our Colonel rang out clearly above the diablerie of noise—"Forward, One Hundred and Fourteenth—FORWARD!" Nothing but the words of Tennyson,

> "Into the jaws of death,
> Up to the gates of hell," could occur to me at that instant; and they did occur to me with all their grim significance. The other regiments of the brigade, and McMillan's brigade, were brought hastily up and disunited, each regiment being placed where it was supposed its presence might be most required to oppose the threatened Rebel advance; my own, three hundred and fifty strong, advanced beyond the point of woods, where it halted. And there, before our eyes, was a sight which might well have made strong hearts falter and firm cheeks grow pale. A long line of battle stretched before us in front of the opposite wood, far outreaching us upon either flank, while three battle-flags blew out defiantly from its whole length, and from front, right, and left a stream of bullets searched the air, singing their demoniac song in our ears, and smiting down their victims thickly about us; while from the Rebel line rose cheer after cheer, sounding to us almost like the voice of doom. The Second division was retiring in disorderly rout; the brigade in our immediate front being resolved into a mass of stragglers who thronged the fields, throwing up their hands as they discovered us, and begging us not to fire till they had reached the wood. We tried to rally them; but that was a task which their own officers could not do, and which is rarely accomplished with a scattered command while under the same fire that disorganized it. They thronged back to the shelter of the woods, and there, in that horrible slaughter-pen, for one long hour our regiment held the place that had been given it. For one long hour there was an incessant cross-fire of musketry between those opposing lines, as fast as the men could load and fire. There was no concealment, no shelter: the ground was open, the position of each well understood; our business simply to withstand the Rebel advance, punishing him to our utmost, and receiving his blows as long as they could be endured. Most literally were these orders obeyed.

The horror, the utter dreariness of battle, never dragged more surely at the heart-strings of brave men than at those of this little band, fighting at the angle of that wood until one hundred and ninety, or more than one-half the whole, had fallen dead and wounded. There was a strange fascination in the scene. On your right and left, men go down while you are commending their good fighting, and urging them to keep up to the work; they fall in front of you till you find yourself in the ranks, instead of behind them—some lapsing heavily to the ground, stricken with instant death, and others settling slowly down with grievous wounds, and limping or crawling back as best they may. It is a scene of wild confusion, replete with horrors and ringing with unearthly cries and noises.

Our Colonel had gone to the rear, badly hurt, with seven other officers, and the Major at last withdrew the poor remnant of his command into the woods, to save it from utter demolition. But General Dwight had gained the time he desired to dispose his regiments advantageously; the First brigade was in line on the right, and McMillan's on the left, and a battery of artillery had been posted in a gap of the woods, well to the front, and was rapidly throwing shells towards the Rebel line. And all this time the noise of battle rolled away from the left, where Wright was fighting a stern fight of endurance, and where the noble Russell had already fallen at the head of his division, and where Ricketts and Getty steadfastly held their line. My regiment, with but a handful of men, rallying upon its colors, took position on the right of Beale's brigade. As we moved at double-quick through the woods, the scene presented was disheartening enough. Some of the regiments of Grover's division had been rallied and moved to the left, where they were renewing the fight in gallant style; but the woods were filled with stragglers, officers as well as men, some of them sheltering themselves behind the great tree-trunks from the searching bullets, and here and there a dozen men gathered disconsolately about a color, a poor representative of what was an hour before a full regiment. Emory and Grover rode through this demoralized mass, striving to bring it back to order, and the staff labored right well in the same work. The line of the Second division was at last re-established; but it never saw before so dismal an hour as that which followed its repulse upon this field. Our right was weak, fearfully overmatched by the Rebel left, but it steadily bore the shocks of their furious masses, and manfully stood up to its work.

The fight now raged furiously along the whole line. From one o'clock till three, one uninterrupted crash of cannon and muskets shook the air, and great wreaths of smoke hung lazily over the field. Beale's brigade had taken position behind a rail fence, the men lying down to load, and rising to the knee to fire, until they grew merry over their grim work, and something like the routine of a drill was seen in the loading and firing. The Rebel line had apparently not advanced a foot; it was prostrate on the ground, like ours, but the blue feathers of smoke curling up in front showed our men where to fire. Their bullets hummed through the long grass; and here and there a dull thud was heard as a man leaped up and fell again, smitten with a leaden envoy of death. It was easy to see that we were fighting with veterans who had learned the difficult lessons of range and elevation in musket-firing. One of our lieutenants was mortally wounded while lying flat, with his shoulders slightly elevated, and of all the wounds received, a very large proportion were in the legs. The Rebel artillery had a great advantage in position, and annoyed us seriously all through the battle. It was while we were fighting behind this fence that an incident occurred which had, to my mind, a touch of stern humor about it. One of our men had fallen with his head torn entirely from his shoulders by a round shot. As the body lay on the ground, the full knapsack rose almost a foot above it; and one of the soldiers, full of the fury of the fight, seized upon his head comrade for shelter and rest, loading behind the body, and firing over the knapsack. The cry was raised about half past two, along the line, "More cartridges!" and as they were not at hand, the brigade was withdrawn a little into the shelter of the wood, and an aide dispatched for ammunition.

A shout now ran along the right from lip to lip—a joyous cheer, rising above the clamor of the battle, and announcing that Sheridan was on the line. He came on the field like a whirlwind, riding the proud black pacer which afterward carried him to Cedar Creek, and followed by a few of his staff. The noble animal he rode curveted and pranced so that it was impossible for Sheridan to hold him for a moment at any particular regiment, as he wished to do; but this rather added to the nervous, enthusiastic manner of the rider as he shook his hat toward the Rebel line, shouting to his soldiers,

"I tell you, boys, we've hardly commenced to fight those fellows yet! We can whip them any day—and by——— we must whip them to day!"

He was himself a living inspiration—a reinforcement better than a whole division would have been. At that most critical hour of the day, when the stern work of endurance had been prolonged for hours, and thousands of our best and bravest had fallen, his presence was an assurance of ultimate victory. Wherever the fight was most furious, there was Sheridan, impetuous, confident, irresistible. He flashed up and down the line of the Sixth corps, bursting out into quick, energetic appeals as the men recognized him, and half suspended their firing to give "three cheers for Phil. Sheridan."

"Hold this line, men—only hold it an hour longer," he exclaimed to one of the regiments, "and the day is ours! Crook is getting in on the right—you'll hear from him soon—and the cavalry will finish them. Only hold this line and give them the devil a little longer!"

It was done; he knew it would be. A supply of ammunition was brought up to Beale's brigade, and again the firing burst furiously forth from this quarter of the field. The men could not wait to pry off the covers from the stout boxes; they were demolished against the tree-trunks, and the line was supplied with the cartridges gathered up in handfuls from the ground. The tall, dry grass between the combatants took fire, and the added smoke obscured the position of each; but the terrible firing never relaxed. A constant stream of wounded went back from the front. The battle smoked and flamed with furious and deadly vigor along the whole line, both armies steadfastly standing to the work of death, and each occupying the position it had at first assumed.

Toward four o'clock something like a lull occurred. The firing became more desultory from the enemy—possibly on account of an attempt to concentrate troops upon their left, which their cavalry, which Torbet drove before him, must have by this time reported as the critical point. There was still firing between the lines, both of artillery and small arms; but it came in fitful bursts, and not at all like the tumultuous roar which had shaken the air for three hours. Gen. Emory rode up to our brigade, and I fancied that his stern face wore a look of mingled pride and sadness when we told him that this wasted fragment represented Beale's brigade. "You shall be relieved," he said; and some regiments from the Eighth corps soon took our place in the front, while we were withdrawn further into the woods. An hour of such rest as only the powder-blackened and wearied soldier from the front can enjoy, was here afforded us, while anxious questions were asked and answered about those whom we missed from the ranks.

Five o'clock came, and with it the end. The detour had been made. The Eighth corps with the weight of our cavalry, under Crook, constituting one-third of our forces, had, after hours of toil, obtained their position; and the firing burst forth with renewed fury away upon the Rebel left, where the magnificent masses of the Eighth corps now bore steadily down. General Crook had experienced much difficulty in getting his corps in position, on account of a large swamp between our right and the pike; but after this obstacle was passed, the corps was soon formed in heavy columns. It was Sheridan's thunderbolt, and the moment for launching it had come. The Rebels now comprehended the plan, and frantic efforts were made upon the left to stay the attacking columns; but Crook had chafed for hours for his chance, and was not now to be stopped. A steady discharge of musketry tore through his ranks as he advanced, and the artillery from the hills again joined in the fight: but the gallant Eighth bore right on, and the left of Early's wavering army recoiled and crumbled before it. This was the moment which Sheridan seized for an advance of the whole line. Forming a connection, the Sixth and Nineteenth swept over the field which they had so hotly contested. But the victory was won; Early's army was already retreating in disorderly panic through Winchester, abandoning arms and cannon and prisoners by the thousand. As we cleared the woods and neared the hills upon which the artillery was posted, which was still thundering at us, loth to quit the field, we saw the cavalry squadrons charge over the hill in an irresistible torrent, cheering wildly as they scattered the gunners and fell upon the rear of the flying infantry as it entered the town. Discipline and organization disappeared together before the onset of those terrible troopers, and all night long the routed army hurried up the pike toward Strasburg, intent upon the refuge of Fisher's Hill.

The losses in killed and wounded upon our side were heavy, as they must necessarily be in a battle fought in five hours in the open field, and at close musket range; but all any doubts existed in our minds as to the effect of our fire upon the Rebel divisions in our front, they were dispelled by the appearance of the field as we passed over it. The edge of the woods where Grover had struggled obstinately with Early's left was lined with the slain of both sides; but the Rebel dead lay thickly in the fields beyond, and were piled upon each other in the yard of a large stone mansion which was directly in front of Emory's position. A ghastly row of gray-clad corpses lay along a wall, behind which some Rebel brigade had evidently found shelter; and the fields and hillsides as far as Winchester were dotted with the fallen. Muskets and accoutrements littered the ground; dead horses were plenty where the artillery had taken position, and clots of blood tinged the grass in spots, or were gathered in little pools in the hollows. A wounded Rebel prisoner told me that after three years service in the Confederate armies, he had never seen such slaughter on a battle-field as in this brief, fierce engagement.

The proud success of the Federal arms at this last battle of Winchester was due to the military genius of Sheridan, and to the splendid and persistent fighting of his troops. General Sheridan is not, as some of his critics have assumed, a mere Murat—a leader who can fight upon another's plans, but who has no head for combinations. His blow is studied with the most careful elaboration, and when it falls, it is annihilation. With such a leader and with such soldiers, we need never hesitate to assume the offensive in war.—James Franklin Fitts, Galaxy.

CLEOPATRA.

"Her beauty might outface the jealous hours,
Turn shame to love and pain to a tender sleep,
And the strong nerve of hate to sloth and tears;
Make spring rebellious in the sides of frost,
Thrust out lank winter with hot August growths,
Compel sweet blood into the husks of death,
And from strange breasts enforce harsh courtesy."
T. HAYMAN, Full of Antony, 1655.

HER mouth is fragrant as a vine,
A vine with birds in all its boughs;
Serpent and scarab for a sign
Between the beauty of her brows
And the amorous deep lids divine.

Her great curled hair makes luminous
Her cheeks, her lifted throat and chin.
Shall she not have the hearts of us
To shatter, and the loves therein
To shed between her fingers thus?

Small ruined broken strays of light,
Pearl after pearl she shreds them through
Her long sweet sleepy fingers, white
As any pearl's heart veined with blue,
And soft as dew on a soft night.

As if the very eyes of love
Shone through her shutting lids, and stole
The slow looks of a snake or dove;
As if her lips absorbed the whole
Of love, her soul the soul thereof.

Lost, all the lordly pearls that were
Wrung from the sea's heart, from the green
Coasts of the Indian gulf-river;
Lost, all the loves of the world—so keen
Towards this queen for love of her.

You see against her throat the small
Sharp glittering shadows of them shake;
And through her hair the imperial
Curled likeness of the river snake,
Whose bite shall make an end of all.

Through the scales sheathing him like wings,
Through hieroglyphs of gold and gem,
The strong sense of her beauty stings,
Like a keen pulse of love in them,
A running flame through all his rings.

Under those low large lids of hers
She hath the histories of all time;
The fruit of foliage-stricken years;
The old seasons with their heavy chime,
That leaves its rhyme in the world's ears.

She sees the heart of death made bare,
The raveled riddle of the skies,
The faces faded that were fair,
The mouths made speechless that were wise,
The hollow eyes and dusty hair;

The shape and shadow of mystic things,
Things that fate fashions or forbids;
The staff of time-forgotten kings
Whose name falls off the Pyramids,
Their coffin-lids and grave-clothings;

Dank dregs, the scum of pool or clod,
God-spawn of lizard-footed clans,
And those dog-headed hulks that trod
Swart necks of the old Egyptians,
Raw draughts of man's beginning God;

The poised hawk, quivering ere he smote,
With plume-like gems on breast and back;
The asps and water-worms afloat
Between the rush-flowers moist and slack;
The cat's warm black bright rising throat.

The purple days of drouth expand
Like a scroll opened out again;
The molten heaven drier than sand,
The hot red heaven without rain,
Sheds iron pain on the empty land.

All Egypt aches in the sun's sight;
The lips of men are harsh for drouth,
The fierce air leaves their cheeks burnt white,
Charred by the bitter blowing south,
Whose dusty mouth is sharp to bite.

All this she dreams of, and her eyes
Are wrought after the sense hereof.
There is no heart in her for sighs;
The face of her is more than love—
A name above the Ptolemies.

Her great grave beauty covers her
As that sleek spoil beneath her feet
Clothed once the anointed soothsayer;
The hallowing is gone forth from it
Now, made unmeet for priests to wear.

She treads on gods and god-like things,
On fate and fear and life and death,
On hate that cleaves and love that clings,
All that is brought forth of man's breath
And perisheth with what it brings.

She holds her future close, her lips
Hold fast the face of things to be;
Actium, and sound of war that dips
Down the blown valleys of the sea,
Far sails that flee, and storms of ships;

The laughing red sweet mouth of wine
At ending of life's festival;
That spice of cerecloths, and the fine
White bitter dust funereal
Sprinkled on all things for a sign;

His face, who was and was not he,
In whom, alive, her life abode;
The end, when she gained heart to see
Those ways of death wherein she trod,
Goddess by god, with Antony.

ALGERNON SWINBURNE.

PAGANINI'S WOODEN-SHOE CONCERT.

TOWARDS the end of September, 1832, it was announced amongst the artistic circles of Paris, that Nicolo Paganini had fallen seriously ill, at the conclusion of a grand concert given by that illustrious violinist. He was attacked by a low intermitting fever, which refused to yield to the remedies employed, and even gave rise to apprehensions for his life.

Paganini, whose leanness was already almost spectral, now seemed to have his frail existence suspended by a thread, which the slightest shock might sever. The physicians unanimously ordered solitude, absolute repose, and a strict regimen as to diet.

In order to carry out these prescriptions, Paganini removed to the Villa Lutetiana, in the Faubourg Poissonniere. This excellent establishment, which no longer exists, was intended exclusively for the reception and cure of wealthy invalids. A spacious, comfortable house stood in a large, park-like garden, where each patient could ramble at will, and enjoy either solitude or society at his choice. A great charm of this house was that every one lived just as he or she pleased; in the evening either retiring to the solitude of his apartment, or joining in the games, music, and conversation held in the drawing-room. Paganini naturally belonged to those who preferred passing the evenings in quietness and retirement. There was plenty of gossip about him in the drawing-room; three or four censorious old ladies fell on him tooth and nail.

"Ladies," began one, "have you seen this great musician? He salutes no one, and never speaks a word. He takes his bowl of soup in an arbor in the garden, and then hastens away if any one approaches. What an oddity he must be!"

"That's part of his malady," said another; "people say that there is some terrible mystery about his life; some love story, I imagine."

"Not at all," added a third; "Paganini is a miser; there's no mystery about that. Do you remember that concert which was organized in favor of the families who had suffered from the inundation at St. Etienne? The great violinist refused to take part in it because he would have had to play gratuitously. Depend upon it he fears that, were he to mix in our society, he might be asked for similar favors."

"Paganini guessed pretty well how he was regarded by his fellow-boarders, but, like Gallio of old, he cared for none of these things. His health became gradually better, yet in the whole house he never exchanged a word with any one except Nicette. This was the housemaid who attended on him; a cheerful, innocent country girl, whose gay prattle, when she served his meals, often availed to dispel the cloud which habitually darkened the brows of Paganini.

One morning Nicette presented herself with a sad, drooping countenance, and served breakfast without uttering a word. The musician, who was amusing himself with carving a piece of ivory for the handle of a dagger, noticed the change in the young girl, and questioned her upon it.

"What's the matter, my child? You look sad; your eyes are red; some misfortune has befallen you, Nicette?"

"O, yes, sir."

"Would it be indiscreet to ask you what it is?"

"No, sir, not precisely; but—"

Paganini fixed his great black eyes on the girl's troubled countenance.

"Come," he said; "I see how it is. After having made you a thousand promises he has quitted you, and you no longer have any tidings of him."

"Ah! poor fellow! He has quitted me certainly, but it was not his fault!"

"How is that?"

"Because in the conscription he drew a bad number, and he has been sent away with a great long gun on his shoulder, and I shall never see him again," sobbed poor Nicette, as she buried her face in her white apron.

"But, Nicette, could you not purchase a substitute for him?"

The girl, withdrawing her apron, smiled sadly through her tears.

"Monsieur is jesting," she said; "how could I ever buy a substitute?"

"Does it cost very dear?"

"This year men are tremendously dear, on account of the report that there is going to be a war. Fifteen hundred francs is the lowest price."

The musician pressed Nicette's little plump hand between his long sallow fingers, as he said—

"If that's all, my girl, don't cry; we'll see what can be done."

Then, taking out his pocket-book, he wrote on a blank leaf—

"Mem. To see about giving a concert for the benefit of Nicette."

A month passed on; winter arrived, and Paganini's physician said to him—

"My dear sir, you must not venture out of doors again until after the month of March."

"To hear is to obey," replied the musician.

During the winter a comparative degree of health and strength returned to Paganini. Having no longer the pleasant, shady arbors of the garden as a refuge, he began gradually to linger a little in the drawing-room. After dinner he used to throw himself on a sofa of crimson velvet, and pass half an hour in turning over a volume of engravings, or in sipping a glass of sugared water flavored with orange-flowers. The old ladies of the society gossiped on about him and his odd ways, but he affected not to hear, and certainly did not heed them.

Christmas-eve approached. On the anniversary of the birth of Our Lord, a custom exists in France, very dear to its juvenile inhabitants. A wooden shoe is placed at the corner of the hearth, and a beneficent fairy—the French Santa Claus—is supposed to come down the chimney laden with various presents and dainties, with which he fills it. It is calculated that one year with another the Christmas wooden shoe enriches the trade of Paris with two million francs.

On the morning of the 24th December four of Paganini's female critics were in consultation together.

"It will be for this evening," said one.

"Yes, for this evening; that's settled," replied another.

After dinner Paganini was, according to his custom, seated on the drawing-room sofa, sipping his eau sucrée, when an unusual noise was heard in the corridor. Presently Nicette entered, and announced that a porter had arrived with a case, directed to Signor Paganini.

"I don't expect any case," said he; "but I suppose he had better bring it in."

Accordingly, a stout porter entered, bearing a good-sized deal box, on which, besides the address, were the words, "Fragile, with care." Paganini examined it with some curiosity, and having paid the messenger, proceeded to open the lid. His long, thin, but extremely muscular fingers, accomplished this task without difficulty, and the company, whose curiosity caused them somewhat to transgress the bounds of good manners, crowded around in order to see the contents of the box.

The musician first drew out a large packet, enveloped in strong brown paper, and secured with several seals. Having opened this, a second, and then a third envelope appeared; and at length the curious eyes of twenty persons were regaled with a gigantic wooden shoe, almost large enough to serve for a child's cradle. Bursts of laughter hailed the discovery.

"Ah!" said Paganini, "a wooden shoe. I can guess tolerably well who has sent it. Some of these excellent ladies wish to compare me to a child who always expects presents and never gives any. Well! be it so. We will see if we cannot find some method of making this shoe worth its weight in gold."

So saying, and scarcely saluting the company, Paganini withdrew to his own apartment, carrying with him the case and its contents.

During three days he did not reappear in the drawing-room; Nicette informed the company that he worked from morning till night with carpenter's tools. In fact, the musician, whose hands were wondrously flexible and dexterous in other things besides violin playing, had fashioned a perfect and sonorous instrument out of the clumsy wooden shoe. Having enriched it with one silver string, his work was complete. Next day a public notice appeared, that on New Year's eve Paganini would give a concert in the large hall of the Villa Lutetiana. The great master announced that he would play ten pieces, five on a violin, five on a wooden shoe. The price of the tickets was fixed at twenty francs each. Of these only one hundred were issued, and it is needless to add that they were immediately purchased by the élite of the beau monde, who, during several months' had missed the pleasure of hearing Paganini. The appointed evening arrived; the hall, furnished with comfortable chairs, was prepared and lighted for the occasion, elegant equipages were stationed along the Faubourg Poissonniere, and expectation was on tip-toe to know what the announcement respecting the wooden shoe could possibly mean.

At length Paganini appeared, smiling, with every appearance of renewed health, and on his favorite violin played some of those marvellous strains which never failed to transport his auditors to the seventh heaven of delight. Then he seized the shoe, which, in its new guise of a violin, still preserved somewhat of pristine form, and, his whole being lighted up with enthusiasm, he commenced one of those wondrous improvisations which captivated the souls of his hearers. This one represented first the departure of a conscript, the tears, the wailing of his betrothed, then his stormy life in the camp, and on the field of battle, and finally, his return, accompanied by triumph and rejoicing. A merry peal of wedding-bells completed the musical drama. Long and loud were the thunders of applause; even the old ladies who disliked Paganini could not refrain from clapping, and bouquets, thrown by fair and jeweled hands, fell at the feet of the musician. In a corner of the hall, next the door, poor Nicette—who had been invited—was weeping bitterly; the symphony of the conscript had gone straight to her heart. At the end of the concert the receipts were counted; they amounted to two thousand francs.

"Here, Nicette," said Paganini, "you have five hundred francs over the sum required to purchase a substitute; they will pay your bridegroom's traveling expenses."

Then, after a pause, he continued, "But you will want something wherewith to begin housekeeping. Take this shoe violin or this violin-shoe, and sell it for your dowry."

Nicette did so, and received from a rich amateur six thousand francs for Paganini's wooden shoe.

It is now in the possession of an English nobleman, who was formerly British Ambassador at Paris.

THE CALIFORNIAN.

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 10. 1866.

BLACK SHEEP.—A story by Edmund Yates, from Charles Dickens' Magazine, with summary of portions already published, is continued in to-day's CALIFORNIAN.

A PECULIAR COMMUNITY.

EVERY considerable community has its peculiar characteristics which make it, in some respects at least, unlike any other community. This is well understood by the most skilful caterers for the public in matters of taste, who know that an article well adapted to one market often proves a drug in another. The fact that an actor, or an orator, a journalist, or a minister, was admired and successful in Boston or New York, furnishes but a slender guaranty that he will prove acceptable in San Francisco. In fact, neither Boston nor New York is so critical or so exacting as San Francisco. "Mark Twain's facetious advice to Mr. Forrest not to venture out here, warning him that our local critics would pronounce him not up to the standard, proved to be no joke, but a prediction which was literally fulfilled. Let no one come to this city relying upon the prestige of an Eastern or a European reputation, for such prestige is a capital of the most precarious character in California. It would scarcely be a safe thing to predict that Ristori herself, should she honor us with a visit, would meet with a very enthusiastic reception. Boston has been christened the modern Athens, but in many respects San Francisco has a better claim to the title than any city in the United States. It would not indeed be strictly accurate to apply to our community the language of the writer of the Acts of the Apostles, in which he describes the Athenians as spending their time "in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing;" for notwithstanding our eagerness to hear "the news," our people are not idlers or dawdlers, and they throw a tremendous energy into their business and their pleasures. Like the Athenians, we love to gossip, but it is as a recreation and not as a regular occupation. Like them we are emotional, mobile, uncertain, exacting, and remorselessly critical. Like them we are sudden and strange in our likings and dislikings; and with us as with them, when once the tide of feeling and criticism begins to swell orto ebb, it moves with a constantly accelerating speed and power, and the attempt to oppose it by argument becomes about as hopeful as it would be to undertake to paddle a canoe against the stream of Niagara.

Hence, it behooves all who have a "first appearance" to make in San Francisco, to spare no pains to produce a favorable impression at the start; for there is probably no community in the world where the first impression is so important. Let the current of public opinion once begin to set in any given direction, and it is almost impossible to arrest it. Facts and circumstances may change; the whole merits of the matter may be reversed; but public opinion, having already received an impetus that has determined its direction, cannot be easily changed in its course.

Again, opinion with us knows no mean. It inevitably gravitates to extremes. Every new thing of sufficient moment to attract general attention and become the talk of the town, produces either a chill or a fever, transports of admiration or paroxysms of disgust. New candidates for favor are greeted either with pæans, or with snarls, and sneers, and gibes. How public opinion will incline on any particular point, mortal wisdom cannot determine beforehand; but the moment it begins to take shape, it spreads like an epidemic, and it is as idle to ask those under its influence the reason for the enthusiasm of their praise or censure as to ask a hospital patient a reason for his having the cholera.

Yet the whirligig of Time is sure, here as elsewhere, to bring about its revenges and its recompenses, however long deferred. Ultimately the idol of accident or favorable circumstance is sure to be hurled with ignominy from its shrine; and the victim of capricious or impulsive criticism will not only be freed from unmerited odium, but by virtue of the reaction which must inevitably come at last, be elevated to a higher level of appreciation than could be legitimately claimed. Daniel Webster said, "There is always room in the upper stories," and no one who feels able to furnish a better article than can be found in the market, need despair of meeting with encouragement.

MR. WILKIE COLLINS, who is reported to be threatened with the consumption, is traveling in the south of Europe for his health.

A CRITICAL AGE.

THE present is not only a critical age, but it is fast becoming most disagreeably critical for all old logies who cherish the traditions of the past. The names of Cooper and Irving are dear to most of our literary men who have passed the middle period of life; but the rising luminaries who are to fill the places that we now fill, and who are already shouldering us from the path, have elevated the standard of literary excellence to such a height that these favorites of our earlier years fall far below it. "Gradually," says the New York Nation, "Washington Irving is slipping into the class of authors who are much praised and not much read." With our old-fashioned predilections, we feel like exclaiming, "More's the pity," as we read this harsh announcement. At Sleepy Hollow, they are building a church in Irving's honor among the scenes which, as we used to phrase it, "his genius had immortalized." But this phrase was of course highly extravagant if the author of the Sketch Book, and Bracebridge Hall, and the Knickerbocker History is already "slipping into the class of authors who are much praised and little read." The Nation further informs us that this church is a tribute to Irving's memory, paid, not by the young and perspicacious critics of the Round Table and Nation school, who sneer at all that has yet been achieved by American writers, but by old fogies like ourselves, who still persist in admiring Cooper's novels and Irving's sketches and narratives. "It will not," says the Nation, "be the tribute of the rising generation, but of the generation that is passing away, and though it is hardly possible that our sweet-natured humorist (Irving) should always be liked, he will never again be popular. Since his day other American gentlemen have travelled in Europe, and sat at meat with men of great name; our national vanity has no need to content itself now with such small sops as praise for having produced, among our red men and buffaloes, a person who was not only a gentleman, but also could actually write the English language correctly; other American authors have obtained the plaudits of transatlantic critics, and transatlantic applause has been declining in estimation since the days when our fathers bowed down to Jeffrey, and raved over Martin Chuzzlewit, and gave bad Change for the American Notes. Therefore Irving gets more strict justice, now that he is no longer our international champion. Probably it will be in the war of rebellion that the future historian of American literature will find the line which divides Irving's existence as an American author of the highest repute and most in favor from his existence as a writer whose name is better known than his works."

We regret to see this style of criticism adopted by such a paper as the Nation, which is ordinarily much above the grade of the Round Table and the flippant and frivolous Citizen. It may be true that "we hate what we once tolerated," and that, "we no longer care for what we once liked," but the question is whether this change in our tastes is evidence of our fickleness and capriciousness, or of a purer taste. Of those who maintain the latter proposition we feel as though we had a right to demand that before we consent to dethrone our old favorites, they should point out to us the writers who are to fill their places. The Round Table and the Nation insist that Cooper and Irving are no longer legitimate objects of admiration. Will they inform us who are their more worthy successors—who are the American writers that have eclipsed them?

WE have received the October No. (15th) of The Galaxy, a semi-monthly illustrated magazine, from W. E. Loomis, corner Sansome and Washington streets, who is the agent for California. The graphic and succinct account of "The last Battle of Winchester," on the sixth page of to-day's CALIFORNIAN, by J. Franklin Fitts, who commanded a brigade in that battle, is taken from The Galaxy.

MR. EDMUND YATES at the last accounts was at Braemar, the seat of the Earl of Fife. His new novel, Black Sheep, promises to be widely read in this country, the New York Albion and Every Saturday reprinting it in installments.

AN exchange, in noticing the presentation of a silver cup to the editor of another paper, says: "He needs no cup. He can drink from any vessel that contains liquor, whether the neck of a bottle, the mouth of a demijohn, the spile of a keg, or the bung of a barrel."

DR. HOLMES, who wrote a poem—or, more strictly speaking, a copy of verses—which Assistant-Secretary Fox, if that be the official title of the gentleman, read or presented to the Emperor of Russia, is making a sensation in St. Petersburg, where his verses were published as by Oliver Vendel Golins!

MR. BAYARD TAYLOR contemplates lecturing again, we hear, during a portion of the fall and winter.

THE Emperor Napoleon will, it is said, commence the Life of Charlemagne on the completion of his Life of Cæsar.

ANNIE LEE.

HOW sweet 'tis to think o' lang syne, Annie Lee!
When youth, grace, and beauty were thine, Annie Lee!
When heart beat against heart,
Whaur nae ane could see,
I thocht thee nae angel
O' bliss, Annie Lee!

Ere Nature had taught us to lo'e, Annie Lee!
'Mang clover fields wet wi' the dew, Annie Lee!
We'd list to the skylark
That sprang frae the lea;
But sweeter by far were
Thy songs, Annie Lee!

Down the glen we aft took a turn, Annie Lee!
An' laved our wee feet in the burn, Annie Lee!
I looked at thy shadow
An' then upon thee,
Au' felt as if spell-bound
To love, Annie Lee!

Wi' bonnie rich ringlets o' huir, Annie Lee!
I never saw ane look sae fair, Annie Lee!
An' thy twa een o' blue
That sparkled wi' glee,
Never shone to deceive
My heart, Annie Lee!

I thocht earth a heaven o' bliss, Annie Lee!
When young courage stole the first kiss, Annie Lee!
The flowers were nae fairer
That bloom on the lea,
The snawdraps nae purer
Than thou, Annie Lee!

The pure heart that's free frae a' sin, Annie Lee!
In the end is aye sure to win, Annie Lee!
So, we ne'er dreamt o' wrang;
O, wha wad wrang thee?
Sweet mate o' my boyhood,
My dear Annie Lee!

Aft love gets what gold canna buy, Annie Lee!
An' gif ony doot let them try, Annie Lee!
They will find to their grief
That a' their hopes dee,
An' naething but love lives
In bliss, Annie Lee!

It is said that true love is blind, Annie Lee!
An' seldom a leal heart can find, Annie Lee!
But the flame waneth not
First kindled by thee;
'Tis fanned by thy love still,
My wife, Annie Lee!

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov., 1866. JAMES LINEN.

SIGNORINA ELVIRA BRAMBILLA—who departs for New York on the Constitution this morning—had a very full and fashionable audience for her farewell benefit on Thursday evening, at the Academy of Music. As an artiste, both in ability and popularity, she has steadily improved during her two years' residence in San Francisco. Her voice has gained in volume, purity, and flexibility; and her dramatic requirements have been put to a very trying—though very successful—test, in the two long Opera seasons of the last two years, in both of which Signorina Brambilla held the position of sole prima donna soprano. The projectors of the new Opera season will be fortunate if they procure a prima donna of such general excellence and versatility as Elvira Brambilla.

SIGNOR S. MILLERI—late basso profundo of the Bianchi troupe—also departs on the Constitution to-day, to fill winter engagements in the East. He will return with his family in the spring to reside permanently among us. There are reports of a new Operatic season in connection with his visit to the East.

"TOPSY TURVY'S" BENEFIT.—The Howson troupe, have kindly volunteered, and set aside Wednesday evening for this lady's benefit at the Metropolitan. The war of Roses—a comedy—and a new song, both emanating from the busy brain and pen of "Topsy," will constitute the principal features of attraction. The song has been set to music by George Felix Benkert, and will be sung by Miss Emma Howson. We trust that "Topsy" may be the recipient of such a benefit as will weary the treasurer with over-exertion, and gladden the hearts of all her friends.

SAN FRANCISCO AMATEURS.—The Eleventh Subscription entertainment, dramatic and social, and the last of the season of this Association, is to be given at Turn-Verein Hall on Thursday evening next. Othello will be performed. The usual social dancing party will follow, closing the record of a pleasant season of festivities.

THE CITY GUARD TARGET EXCURSION AND PICNIC will be held in the beautiful grove of the Encinal, Alameda, on Monday next. Guests are invited, "with ladies," to be at the Alameda ferry landing at 9.30 A. M., and the "Guard" will thenceforth attend to their comfort, pleasure and entertainment for the balance of the day.

WOODWARD'S GARDENS since the recent rains are more fresh, green, and beautiful than ever. Constant additions and improvements are being made to the attractions on the grounds.

THE LION'S MOUTH.

"The gravest beast is an ass, the gravest bird is an owl, the gravest fish is an oyster, and the gravest man is a fool." SYDNEY SMITH.

"I will roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me." A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

"I will aggravate my voice so, that I will roar you as gently as any sucking dove; I will roar you an 't were any nightingale." IBID.

New Wine in an Old Bottle.

EVERYONE must have observed a great improvement in the Alta during the past week. The venerable Grandmamma of the press has been positively sprightly. Editorials have been published which have quite astonished the readers of the Alta. Many of the "solid" men of the city have been alarmed by the sportiveness evinced in some of these editorials, but the public, generally, have been pleased. We are glad to see this change, but we must warn the Alta that it is dangerous to put new wine into an old bottle. Some of the leaders it has published of late have been just a little too young and frisky. They had not gone through all the stages of fermentation. If the Grandmamma of the Press condescends to make jokes, she should not quite throw aside the dignity which is her especial character. The editorial entitled "Louis Napoleon's Mrs. Harris," in Tuesday's issue, was too frothy for the Alta. It won't do to use such expressions as "There's a heap of trouble on the old man's mind" in a political editorial. Then, again, "devilish glad" is a naughty expression. Moreover, "It is all right and lovely and the goose hangs high," is not an expression which Louis Napoleon is likely to make use of, though the writer of this rather flash editorial says:

"We can very readily imagine with what complacency the ex-dictator of European politics read over this little dialogue between himself and the imaginary Mrs. Harris."

None of the readers of the Alta could "very readily imagine" Louis Napoleon talking, even to himself, as he is represented by the writer. The Alta is, however, as we stated before, improving. Its editorials are not quite up to the mark; they are not always written in grammatical English, but still variety is presented in the subjects treated on, and an idea is sometimes presented in a somewhat original manner. The Alta has a scientific editor at present. His science is a rather cheap style of article—the sort of thing you find in Encyclopædias, but not quite so exact. In Tuesday's issue he treats of "electro-quakes," which he has adopted as a polite term for earthquakes. He tells us that—

"It was the falling of an apple from a tree that revealed to Newton the law of gravitation, which led to such a revolution in physical science."

We have never before considered the falling of that apple as a "revelation," but as the scientific editor of the Alta decides that the fall of that apple "revealed" the law of gravitation to Newton, we must accept the statement as a fact. More surprising statements follow:

"No grander circumstance than the simmering of a tea-kettle filled the mind of Watt with the first glimmer of locomotion by means of steam."

This we pronounce to be false. It was no "simmer" which "filled the mind of Watt with the first glimmer of locomotion by means of steam." The water in that tea-kettle was boiling. He then maunders on about Franklin's kite and other things, and finally winds up his article, which is intended to prove that earthquakes are caused by currents of electricity, by saying:

"If this be the true definition of the phenomenon, the compass, if placed in a position entirely free from ulterior influences, ought to exhibit some extraordinary variations previous to an electrical disturbance. It is stated on good authority that the compass on board the Dwina, during the great earthquake of 1857, at Japan, an hour before that occurrence manifested the greatest eccentricity."

This is a terribly weak manner in which to wind up a scientific article. It won't do in a scientific article to state that a compass "manifested the greatest eccentricity;" we must be told what deflections took place, and all that sort of thing. Well, well! the Alta is doing pretty well, and should be encouraged. Editorials are something new to it, and though those which it is publishing at present are rather "yeasty," they have good stuff in them. We hope that this infusion of new and rather young life into Grandmamma Alta's veins will not hurt the old lady, but she must be careful. She must be fed with small doses at first, as Eben Johnson accustoms his cows to eat swill.

The Dignity of Labor.

There is no country in the world in which the rights of labor and the dignity of the laboring man and woman are so fully upheld as they are in the United States, and in not one of the States does labor take such a high station as in California. In Europe, the householder who wishes to engage help is apt to require certificates of good character from the parties who have formerly employed the person who applies for a situation. Here, references are exchanged. Betty, the cook, produces papers testifying to her good character, and then says to her would-be employer: "Now what references can you give me?"

The following advertisement, which appears in a San Francisco paper, proves this to be the case:

PERSONAL.

A LADY WHO UNDERSTANDS COOKING AND EVERY OTHER DEpartment of housekeeping, would take charge of the same for some reliable party who is needing a competent person. Call at, or address * * * N. B—References exchanged."

This is a decidedly "high-toned" manner of applying for a situation as cook. How infinitely more dignified is the heading, "Personal," than that of "Good Cook!" What a delicate and euphemistic rendering of "two years' good character," is "references exchanged!" Perhaps, however, this "lady, who understands cooking," may be an artist. Cooks are as scarce as poets. It is possible that this may be one of those rare beings, a female cook. There have been female painters, female sculptors—it is possible that this may be a female cook. If this lady does really understand the high art of cookery, then, indeed, she must be placed far above the sons and daughters of toil, and may demand references from a millionaire. If he cannot give references to parties who are able to prove him to be a man of cultivated taste, and one capable of appreciating the art which this lady claims to be a possessor of, what avail will be her knowledge of cookery? If on the other hand she is "a good plain cook," great is the conceit, incalculable is the sum of the impudence which prompted her to write "N. B.—Refences exchanged." Capital refers to its banker. A householder must be held to be a respectable and a responsible party until proved to be the reverse. Alas! we fear that the dignity of labor in California is too apt to generate impudence.

The Slaughter of the Innocents.

The Bulletin gives the following report of the work done by the pound master: "In one year the San Francisco pound master has captured 2,360 dogs, and destroyed 2,146 of them. Most of the latter, it may be presumed, were worthless curs, whose absence will never be regretted. The number redeemed was 214 and the fees received were $1,070, so that the establishment for suppressing the dog nuisance has been almost a self-sustaining institution." It is very well for the Bulletin to say that most of the dogs which were destroyed, "it may be presumed, were worthless curs," but it may be presumed, on the other hand, that most of these were not worthless curs. Generally speaking, the dogs captured by the pound master's deputies are pet poodles, handsome Scotch terriers, intelligent and valuable black and tan terriers, and, as a rule, good, well-behaved dogs, who have never been known to bite anyone. The wretches who have, during the past years, prowled round the city stealing dogs on whose heads a tax of two dollars has been levied by the Legislature, and who are therefore fully as much property as cows, sheep, and goats, have selected dogs for whose ransom their owners would gladly have paid far more than five dollars had they known that they were in the pound. The dogs who have been slaughtered have been nice little dogs, wearing pretty collars—educated little dogs, who had been taught to sit up, to give a paw, and to fetch and carry.

In San Francisco there has been a voice heard of children weeping for their playmates who have been ruthlessly snatched by the pound master's deputies. "It may be presumed" that most of the dogs who were not redeemed at five dollars a head, have been eaten in various shapes by the citizens of San Francisco. Until the vile ordinance of the Supervisors, which encourages the slaughter of valuable dogs, is revoked, it is not safe for those who have a prejudice against dog, as an article of food, to eat stews or fricassees in any restaurant in this city. There are nearly as many curs running round at present as there were before; but valuable dogs are becoming very scarce.

Thanksgiving Day.

Frederick F. Low, Governor of the State of California, has issued a proclamation appointing Thursday, 29th of November, a day of Thanksgiving and praise. The Governor sets forth in his proclamation some of the blessings for which it behooves the citizens of California to be thankful, but does not catalogue them fully enough. California has been richly blessed during the past year. As the Governor observes, we have escaped a visitation of the cholera; but he fails to remind us that the sale of swill-milk has been put a stop to. He mentions the fact that we are at peace; but does not mention the fact that Maximilian has abdicated and that the Monroe Doctrine will probably, in the future, be strictly sustained. The rinderpest has not visited our shores; and thousands of cows have been cured of the odious vice of drunkenness by the action of the Board of Supervisors with reference to distillery swill. Religious revivals are in active progress at Platt's Hall; and the lame walk, and the blind receive their sight by means of "the laying on of hands." Moreover, there has been no session of the Legislature this year. The Flag has utterly failed in its efforts to cause a run on the Bank of California, and the Daily Times has appeared. The harvest has been plentiful, and the Fair, held for the purpose of raising funds to build Trinity Church, was a grand success. Queen Emma, of the Sandwich Islands, visited our shores, and the Italian Opera season has come to a termination. Altogether, the year has been a most prosperous and happy one, and we trust that Thanksgiving Day will be strictly observed.

"Jemima" asks for More.

The following epistle sufficiently explains itself. Having been excluded from the "heavy correspondence," by the heavy editor, we have taken pity on "Jemima," and consigned her epistolary morsel to the "Lion's Mouth."

MR. EDITOR: Won't you please give us larger installments of Black Sheep? I do feel so anxious about that poor young man, George Dallas; he seems to want to be good, and to reform, but I am afraid there is not any chance for him. It isn't Routh that I am afraid of at all; but the type of woman presented in Routh's wife is the most dangerous of human creatures. She will lead him on to think she is pure and good, and the one friend in whom he can repose all confidence; she will worm out of him his own secrets, his mother's secrets, and then use them in her peculiarly treacherous way. It is, I believe, impossible for one of those meek-looking, fair-haired, fair-complectioned women to be other than treacherous. They are invariably jealous, not from their excessive love for the object of their preference, but of themselves. They are capable of the most contemptible meanness where their own set are concerned, often making the most false representations with regard to them to the other set. To sum up, from my experience, I believe the type of women alluded to are always untrue to their God, themselves, their set, and *man*kind. What then can we hope for this poor young man, who is at the best very weak. My prayers go with him, poor fellow, and I hope that strength may be given him to overcome this serpent in the form of a comforting angel. But I shall feel very anxious, Mr. Editor, so do please give us a more liberal allowance. Trustingly Yours, JEMIMA.

Hoteldom.

We don't believe in monopolies, and we really can't see why a man can't be permitted to "keep a hotel," even if his name isn't Leland. But things are coming to such a pass in the United States that none of the Smiths, Browns, Tompkinses, Jones, etc., can exercise their constitutional privilege of "keeping a hotel" without changing their names to "Leland." The New York Citizen, referring to this subject, says:

"Isn't it about time for our friends the Lelands to stop their spreading tendencies? Radiating from the magnificent Metropolitan, in this city, we find lines of Hoteldom in every part of the habitable globe. If you go to the Pacific coast, is not the Occidental there? If you go to Saratoga, is not the Union there? If you go to Springfield, Illinois, is not the Leland House there? How it may be in China, in the Isles of the Sea, and the Holy Land, we know not; but everywhere else we find either the superb Simon, the cheerful Charles, the wonderful Warren, the wily William, the hospitable Horace, the lovely Lewis, the—but why go on? Is not the list endless, and is not the genial courtesy of them all paralleled alone by their tact and success? As the Good Book beautifully observes of the numerous progeny of a gentleman named Zerniah, so we may say of these marvellous brothers—that 'ye be too hard upon us, O ye children of Leland!'"

Quite Complacent.

The Alta, some eight or ten months since, furnished the public with a history of its career, and of what it had done for the State. The lively little Chronicle, in imitation of this illustrious precedent, spread itself as follows:

"At the present period, when new journalistic enterprises are continually appearing upon the field, to compete with old and established favorites, we think it timely and becoming on our part, as one of said venerable, popular and solidly founded institutions, and in imitation of the excellent example set us by our large sized contemporary, the Alta, to indulge in a brief retrospective glance at our own brilliant and eventful career, and remind our readers and the public generally, of the valuable services we have rendered this community, and which, numerous and important as they are, might without some such formal historic commemoration, run the risk of passing into oblivion. The Chronicle made its first debut upon the stage of metropolitan journalism on the sixteenth day of January, 1865. Consequently it did not, like our more fortunate neighbor already alluded to, enjoy the distinguished honor and felicity of discovering California, and bestowing upon it our own name. And this is perhaps well, since Alta California is upon the whole a better designation for a province or a State (though not for a newspaper) than Dramatic Chronicle. Neither have we even passed through the awful experience of being killed in a duel and being resuscitated. Neither did we put down the rebellion; nor have we at any time rejoiced in eleven able editors; nor have we obtained the despatches (though we can now get them for nothing, but cannot afford them space). But we have done some memorable things that History will not readily suffer to perish—at least she ought to be ashamed if she does. We opened the eyes of a deluded public to the charlatan acting of the spasmodic Heron. We gave that timid creature Wheatleigh a splended start, which he hadn't the enterprise or the pluck to improve. We carried John Woodard and the Olympic on our shoulder till we got him through the deep water. We repressed the exuberant ferocity and domineering arrogance of the Examiner, and have finally succeeded in making a tolerably respectable paper of it, which is about equivalent to working a miracle. We administered much wholesome correction to the Flag (we pause to drop a sympathizing tear upon its grave) and our conscience is at times haunted by the painful suspicion that we may occasionally have laid on the scourge with undue severity."

That "sympathizing tear" seems to have been somewhat premature, inasmuch as the Flag is sailing along in its accustomed belligerent style. As to the benefits conferred upon the State by the Chronicle, they are so well and generally known that it was scarcely necessary to enumerate them.

Send them to Congress.

The great work of the day is the work of "reconstruction." The great demand of the day is for competent "reconstruction." The President and Congress have been worrying and bothering and squabbling over this work for some time without making much headway. The great want of the nation to day is able and judicious reconstruction. Now we have a suggestion to make. The men (whoever they may be) who have recently reconstructed the Alta have evinced a rare and marvellous genius for reconstruction. They have actually put "new wine into old bottles"—and the old bottles have not burst. They have made a live newspaper out of one that, if not absolutely dead, was in a cataleptic trance. In short, they have shown a genius for reconstruction that suggests the propriety of sending them to Congress. Men who could "reconstruct" the Alta might reasonably be expected to possess talents that would render them useful in reconstructing the nation.

A Baby Tender.

A man advertises a "Patent Baby Tender," for which he claims great advantages. It appears from the advertisement that patent babies are, by this "tender," freed from nearly all the ills incidental to patent babyhood. It does not help them in cutting their teeth; it does not cure the measles, but the advertisement, after stating that it turns itself into nine different articles of furniture, says: "It relieves the mother from the hardest part of baby nursing." That is a staggerer! We believe that this "patent baby tender" may possibly turn itself into an ottoman, into a baby-jumper, and lots of other things, but we won't believe that it can turn itself into a cow! Come, now, Mr. Whatsyourname, that's going a little too far.

A PAPER IN A FAMILY.—We never saw a newspaper that was not worth greatly more than its cost in a family. It is to a great extent true of every collection of written matter, book or newspaper, but more especially of the latter, for it covers a greater variety of subjects, and is necessarily more condensed. It is a well known fact that there is no royal road to learning. The brain full of knowledge, whose activity sends light over our daily pathway, has been acquired by hard and constant study. Every book and newspaper which the careful or careless reader picks up, is filled with the results of laborious investigation. Take the single issue of a daily or weekly paper, and see in its editorials, its financial articles, its reviews, its drudgery of daily facts, its quibs and quiddities, its philosophy and fun, how much care and labor must have been bestowed to furnish it all with the regularity of one's meal. It makes no pretensions. It is furnished to every man for a fraction of what his ice or any one of the simple luxuries of his household costs him, and yet it is teeming with thoughts which are constantly influencing his actions, and forming the opinions of his children to govern their after lives. Into the columns of the newspaper come the matured opinions of the greatest thinkers and statesmen of the old world and the new, and at a cost, compared with the value of the information acquired, utterly insignificant in amount. No man, no head of a family especially, who would properly qualify his children to pass respectably, profitably, and with satisfaction to themselves through the world, should ever deny to them the advantages of a daily, or at least, a weekly newspaper.—Daniel Webster.

LIFE.—Life is an enigma. We are here to-day—all activity and bustle, and to-morrow we are gone. We die, but the world moves on as when we were actors on the stage. As we drop away, others take our place and we are scarcely missed. Thus, since the creation; man breathes, moves, and dies. If there were not a solution to this enigma, beyond the confines of the grave, how dull, meagre and unsatisfying would be the few hours we pass on earth!

DRAKE'S PLANTATION BITTERS.

They purify, strengthen and invigorate.
They create a healthy appetite.
They are an antidote to change of water and diet.
They strengthen the system and enliven the mind.
They prevent miasmatic and intermittent fevers.
They purify the breath and acidity of the stomach.
They cure Dyspepsia and Constipation.
They cure Liver Complaint and Nervous Headache.

They are the best Bitters in the world. They make the weak strong, and are exhausted nature's great restorer. They are made of pure St. Croix Rum, the celebrated Calisaya Bark, roots and herbs, and are taken with the pleasure of a beverage, without regard to age or time of day. Particularly recommended to delicate persons requiring a gentle stimulant. Sold by all Grocers, Druggists, Hotels and Saloons. Only genuine when Cork is covered by our private U. S. Stamp. Beware of counterfeits and refilled bottles.

P. H. DRAKE & CO., New York.

"In lifting the kettle from the fire I scalded myself very severely—one hand almost to a crisp. The torture was unbearable. * * * * The Mexican Mustang Liniment relieved the pain almost immediately. It healed rapidly, and left very little scar.

"CHAS. FOSTER, 420 Broad street, Philada."

This is merely a sample of what the Mustang Liniment will do. It is invaluable in all case, of wounds, swellings, sprains, cuts, bruises, spavin, etc., either upon man or beast.

Beware of counterfeits. None is genuine unless wrapped in fine steel-plate engravings, bearing the signature of G. W. Westbrook, Chemist, and the private stamp of DEMAS BARNES & Co., New York.

AGUA DE MAGNOLIA.—The prettiest thing, the "sweetest thing," and the most of it for the least money. It overcomes the odor of perspiration; softens and adds delicacy to the skin; is a delightful perfume; allays headache and inflammation, and is a necessary companion in the sick room, in the nursery and upon the toilet sideboard. It can be obtained everywhere at one dollar per bottle.

LYON'S MAGNETIC INSECT POWDER is instant death to Fleas, Ticks, Roaches, and everything of the insect species. It is one of the few articles that can be relied upon, and for a mere wo bits we can save the bites and bills of these little pests. None is genuine unless signed by E. Lyon, and bearing the private stamp of Demas Barnes & Co., New York.

ALL WHO VALUE A BEAUTIFUL HEAD OF HAIR, and its preservation from premature baldness and turning gray, will not fail to use Lyon's Celebrated KATHAIRON. It makes the hair rich, soft, and glossy, eradicates dandruff, and causes the hair to grow with luxuriant beauty. It is sold everywhere. E. THOMAS LYON, Chemist, N. Y.

LYON'S EXTRACT OF PURE JAMAICA GINGER, for Indigestion, Nausea, Heartburn, Sick Headache, Cholera Morbus, &c., where a warming, genial stimulant is required. Its careful preparation and entire purity make it a cheap and reliable article for culinary purposes. Sold everywhere, at 50 cents per bottle.

NO FORFEITING.—Heretofore, if a person holding a Life Policy became unfortunate, and could not raise the sum of money required to pay his next premium, his policy was declared forfeited. The BROOKLYN LIFE INSURANCE COMPANY OF NEW YORK has decided to make EVERY POLICY it issues NON-FORFEITABLE, giving a PAID-UP POLICY to the party if unable to continue his payments of premiums. The dividends of the Brooklyn Life Insurance Company are settled annually in cash. This plan is far more acceptable to insurers than at the end of three or five years, as in other companies. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company allows thirty days grace in the payment of premiums. Its policies are incontestable, and its losses are promptly paid. The Brooklyn Life Insurance Company offers every known plan of Life and Endowment Insurance. Get a pamphlet at the office, 240 Montgomery street, southeast corner of Pine, from Stephen T. King, General Manager, or David B. Arrowsmith, Local Agent.

MAYER'S BAZAAR is one of the features of San Francisco. Here can be found the greatest variety of watches, jewelry, silver-plated ware, guitars, music-boxes, concertinas, accordeons, opera glasses, and articles of bijouterie for presents or mementos for both ladies and gentlemen. Here, too, you can purchase at prices that defy competition. The present stock must be reduced, and the proprietors are determined to sell so low that the prices asked cannot be objected to. Those heavy cased silver watches from the American Watch company, so celebrated for their correct time and superior workmanship, can be bought at Mayer's Bazaar at the company's prices. Superior French opera-glasses of great magnifying power for sale or hire. Family clocks, musical instruments, and every description of fancy goods at reduced rates at MAYER'S BAZAAR, southeast corner of Montgomery and Pine streets.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

AFRAID OF HIS EARS.

At a social party recently, a noted wag fonnd himself, in the course of the evening, in general conversation with a nervous-lookiug stranger. Pointing out to him a gentlemau of an inquiring turo of mind in another portion of the room, he said: "Do you see that man there? He has a mania—a very unpleasant one, too. He is possessed with the idea that he must bite off strangers' ears, and it has caused a dreadful amount of trouble. I do not know whether he will show any of the symptoms to-night, but perceiving you are a stranger, I deem it my duty to put you on your guard. Don't let him approach very close to you." The expression of horror that spread over the face of the nervous man clearly proved that he had heard the warning. A little later the benevolent informant got opportunity to tell the inquiring man that that man (poiuting out the warned individual) was a physical wonder, as a roaring uoise could be distinctly heard proceeding from his ear by getting within eighteen inches of his ear. Our curious frieud was struck with such an unheard-of phenomena, and very promptly began to work himself close enough for a personal investigation. The movemcnt was seen by the nervous man, and great drops of apprehensive sweat oozed out from his brow and trickled down his cheeks. Nearer and uearer approached the one, and more terribly intepse grew the horror of the other. The space between them was slowly but surely lessening. The curious man was within an ace of the "roaring," when the agony of the "roarer" reached its crisis, and clenching his fist, he landed it between the "lookers" of the unfortunate searcher after physical wonders, shouting at the top of his voice: "Bite off my ears, will you?" The effect of this on the astonished audience was very affecting.

MENTAL MATURITY.

Mental maturity—at what age do we attain it—that is to say, those of us who are not predestiued to perpetual greenuess? It has been said that a mau may be a fool at thirty, and yet die a savage. Rather questionable, that. The fool of forty is admitted by metaphysicians to be a hopeless case. Let him who has learned nothing by experience at that age stand aside from the world of action; he is not fit to play his part in it. His own safety is in being dry uursed by some stronger nature than his own. Dull youths, or youths called dull, sometimes mature into great men. Sheridan, we are told, was a particularly stupid schoolboy. Perhaps, the fault was in the schoolmaster, not in the pupil. There were in Sheridan's day, and there are yet, multitudes of bad teachers. Pedantic pedagogues, of the Dr. Blimber class, are as plentiful as blackberries, and the mill-horse system of educa tion is still in vogue. Over-crammed students rarely turn out well, while those who cannot be crammed generally do. If there is anything that is unpromising, it is precocity. It is better to be comparatively ignorant at five and tweuty, than to be a prodigy at thirteen. We entirely agree with the doctrine that the most useful part of mau's education is not that which he receives in schools and colleges. The world is the university in which the grandest and most useful lossons are taught, and in a way which fixes them indelibly in the memory. The "Groves of Academus" are not to be despised; but let him who desires to be a man among men beware of neglecting those paths of wisdom which lie through the marketplaces of mankind.

Jerusalem is being greatly improved. A telegraph has been established, sewers are being made, and the streets enlarged. The aqueduct from the village of Berak has so far advanced that only the cementing of its parts is required. The cement consists of plaster of Paris, tempered with oil, which is to be furnished by the villages along which the aqueduct passes. In conseqnence of the delay in the supply of this material, the completion of the work, so auxiously looked forward to by the whole city, is greatly protracted.

AGENTS WANTED TO CANVASS FOR THE only official Southern History of the War. THE LOST CAUSE, by E. A. Pollard, the popular Historian of the South, and editor of the Richmond Examiner during the war. Complete in one large royal octavo volume, with

24 FINE STEEL PORTRAITS,

giving a full and authentic account of the rise and fall of the late Southern Confederacy. Written under the encouragement of Generals R. E. Lee, Johnston, Beauregard and others. The work is being liberally patronized by leading men of all classes, eager to hear

"THE OTHER SIDE,"

and thus arrive at the truth of history, which it is impossible to do from the many histories written only from a Northern stand-point.

Agents and the public are cautioned against any other work purporting to be this one. To energetic men and women a rare chance is offered to make money. Don't fail to send for circulars of this great and important work. Adddress

AYER'S

Cathartic Pills,

ARE THE MOST PERFECT purgative which we are able to produce, or which we think has ever yet been made by anybody. Their effects have abundantly shown to the community how much they excel the ordinary medicines in use. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. Their penetrating properties stimulate the vital activities of the body, remove the obstructions of its organs, purify the blood, and expel disease. They purge out the foul humors which breed and grow distemper, stimulate sluggish or disordered organs into their natural action, and impart a healthy tone with strength to the whole system. Not only do they cure the every-day complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases. While they produce powerful effects, they are at the same time, in diminished doses, the safest and best physic that can be employed for children. Being sugar-coated, they are pleasant to take; and, being purely vegetable, are free from any risk of harm. Cures have been made which surpass belief, were they not substantiated by men of such exalted position and character, as to forbid the suspicion of untruth. Many eminent clergymen and physicians have lent their names to certify to the public the reliability of our remedies, while others have sent us the assurance of their conviction that our Preparations contribute immensely to the relief of our afflicted, suffering fellow men.

The Agent below named is pleased to furnish gratis our American Almanac, containing directions for the use and certificates of their cures, of the following complaints.

Costiveness, Billious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache arising from foul stomach, Nausea, Indigestion, Morbid Inaction of the Bowels and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Diseases which require an evacuant medicine. They also, by purifying the blood and stimulating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach, such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability, Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout, and other kindred complaints arising from a low state of the body, or obstruction of its functions.

Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand AYER'S and take no others. The sick want the best aid there is for them, and they should have it.

Prepared by J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by

CRANE & BRIGHAM, San Francisco, and all Dealers

IN ABSENCE.

WATCH her kindly, stars—
From the sweet protecting skies
Follow her with tender eyes;
Look so lovingly that she Cannot choose but think of me;
Watch her kindly, stars!

Soothe her sweetly, night—
On her eyes o'er wearied, press
The tired lids with light caress;
Let that shadowy hand of thine
Ever in her dreams seem mine:
Soothe her sweetly, night!

Wake her gently, morn—
Let the notes of early birds,
Seem like love's melodious words;
Every pleasant sound, my dear,
When she stirs from sleep, should hear:
Wake her gently, morn!

Kiss her softly, winds—
Softly, that she may not miss
Any sweet, accustomed bliss;
On her lips, her eyes, her face,
Till I come to take your place;
Kiss and kiss her, winds!

SCENE IN A SCHOOL ROOM.—The Springfield, Mass., Republican is responsible for the following:

Mistress—Come here, George, I wish to examine you in punctuation. Now, tell me what that is?

George—That's a comma.

Mistress—Right; now what's that?

George—Ah! now you've got me where my hair is short; I don't know.

Mistress—George, I don't wish you to use any slang phrases here. When you are unable to give correct answers, say so, but do not repeat such phrases as that you have just used. Now, what's that?

George—(looking critically at the point in question)—Ha! ha! ha! Now I've got you where your hair is short; that ain't nuthin' only a fly-dirt!

Mistress—(re-examining critically) George, you are dismissed.

"A LITTLE more animation, my dear," whispered Lady B— to the gentle Susan, who was walking through a quadrille. "Do leave me to manage my own business, mamma," replied the provident damsel. "I shall not dance my ringlets out of curl for a married man." "Of course not, my love; but I was not aware who your partner was."

A PAPER "out West" tells of an enthusiastic young Missourian who, eulogizing the beauty of his "gal," said: "I'll be doggoned if you ain't as pooty as a red wagon."

A CONTEMPORARY suggests that a lady, on putting on her corsets, is like a man who drinks to drown his grief, because, in so-lacing herself, she is getting tight.

BLESSED is the man who hath no brains, but brass in abundance, for he shall be the favorite of the ladies.

WATTS, THE REASON?—Why do "birds in their little nests agree?" Because they'd fall out if they didn't.—Punch.

A FAST STORY.

AN ENGLISHMAN was bragging of the speed of English railroads to a Yankee traveler seated at his side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in England. The engine bell was ring as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportunity of "taking down his companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innocently inquired the Yankee.

"We are approaching a town," said the Englishman; "they have to commence ringing about ten miles before they get to a station, or else the train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I suppose they haven't invented bells in America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, "we've got bells, but can't use them on our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead of the sound: the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee. "Why, we've got one firm in San Francisco that has alone imported this season a half a million dollars' worth of Toys and Fancy Goods. They have Talking and Kicking Dolls, born with a full-growu head of hair and teeta in their mouths, saying 'Papa' and 'Mamma', also, Mechanical Toys, that run by themselves, and lots of other Toy wonders too numerous to mention."

"Indeed! is that so? Who is the firm that have the Dolls saying 'Mamma'?" exclaimed the Englishman, very much excited.

"Why, have you never heard in all your travels of FELDBUSH & CO., Wholesale Store, 307 California street, and Retail Store, 207 Montgomery street, San Francisco, where you can save 25 per cent. in purchasing? Fact, I can assure you, as all the goods in their store, 307 California street, and all that is to arrive, must be sold on or before Christmas, on account of some changes in their business. I know it is true, and, if you doubt my word, you call at FELDBUSH & CO.'S, and see for yourself."

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California

In the matter of the Estate of MARGARET CHANCE, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of Francis Chance, the Administrator of the Estate of Margaret Chance, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the heirs of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled:

It is Ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of the said Margaret Chance, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, at the Court Room of said Court, in the City Hall in said city and county, on MONDAY, the 12th day of November, A. D., 1866, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate among the heirs of the said Margaret Chance, deceased, according to law:

It is further Ordered, that a copy of this order be published once a week, for four successive weeks, before the said 12th day of November A. D., 1866, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county. M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

Dated, October 4th, 1866.

Office of the County Clerk of the City and County of San Francisco.—I, Wm. Loewy, County Clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, and ex-officio Clerk of the Probate Court thereof, do hereby certify the foregoing to be a full, true and correct copy of an order duly made and entered upon the minutes of said Court.

Witness my hand and the seal of the said Court, this 4th day of October, A. D., 1866. WM LOEWY, Clerk.

STOP THAT COUGHING.

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE destined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure. But

NEWELL'S

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded for the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup

Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of

HAIR RESTORER.

THIS IS A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY, and stands above comparison with any other article for the Hair ever brought before the public.

A PERFECT

Hair Restorer AND Hair Dresser

BOTH COMBINED IN ONE.

First—It is not a Dye.
Second—Will not Color the Skin.
Third—Will restore Gray Hair to a beautiful Black, Brown, Auburn, or whatever might have been its original color, and cause it to assume its former beauty.
Fourth—Will cure all Humors and Diseases of the Scalp.
Fifth—Will remove Dandruff and Scurf from the head, and keep the hair moist and silk like in its appearance as in youthful days.
Sixth—Will promote a healthy growth.
Seventh—Will prevent it from falling off, and cause it to grow on bald heads where there is life and vitality at the roots, but where these are gone there is no hope of success.
Eighth—The best testimony that can be given will be found inside of each bottle.

Warranted to do all we claim for it, or the money refunded after using two bottles. Try it and be convinced.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea-sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

A SUNNY FACE.

HOW quickly, in a shut and darkened room,
A narrow shutter, suddenly thrown wide,
Will seem to change the thick, oppressive gloom,
To brightest brightness doubly glorified.

I know a face like this—a rare, rare face—
So like a burst of sunshine in the air;
That with a wondrous, winsome, subtle grace,
It scatters gladdest gladness everywhere.

O, happy, happy lot, fair girl, to bear
An amulet like this to shield from harm;
O, choicest, richest fate, always to wear,
Beyond the power of hiding, such a charm!

Erewhile, I ween, some blessed home shall grow
To perfect blessedness beneath that smile;
And all about thee fondest love shall glow,
In a clear atmosphere, unknown to guile.

CURIOUS CAREER OF A CRIMINAL.

LAMIRANDE, who made off with 480,000 francs from the Bank of Poitiers, has been brought back to Paris after an absence of seven months. For seven months a French detective was on his tracks, and never relaxed his pursuit until the quarry was run near Quebec. When the flight of Lamirande, who had been a great beau at Poitiers, was discovered, communications were immediately opened with the Paris police, and one of the cleverest runners was ordered to capture the criminal. Melin, well known to fame, was chosen, and he soon found out that such a person as Lamirande had been driven by a coachman from the Orleans to the Northern Railway station. Melin took a ticket for London, and there obtained several traces, especially in the city, where the guilty party had purchased three hats. He found that his man had gone to Liverpool, and off he set for that town, but only to find that the Moravian had steamed out of harbor the day before with his prey. Having a carte blanche, Melin chartered a screw across the Atlantic. He reached New York before the Moravian, but was unable to arrest Lamirande when he stepped ashore, as his writ did not run, and the prudent criminal denied his identity. Melin, however, a few days later, and with the aid of the French Consul, managed to effect the arrest, and Lamirande was lodged in prison, bnt made his escape whilst the lawyers were arguing about the legality of his extradition. Thinking extradition in Canada an impossibility after the recent correspondence on the subject between France and England, Lamirande fled thither, was captured, and given up by the Governor. What did the man do with the stolen money? He says that he put 210,000f. in a handkerchief, which he left in a railway carriage in London; about 120,000f. were taken from him at New York, after he had paid 56,000f. to the lawyers who defended him, and 20,000f. to an interpreter. When he was captured in Canada he only had thirty-two sous and a revolver in his possession.

"Why this revolver?" said Melin.

"For fear of robbers," was the reply.

"Oui!" said Melin to his prisoners when he landed; "we have had a long game, and you have lost."

To show to what a state the miserable man was reduced, it is only necessary to mention that he was constantly afraid of being separated from his capturer, and he declares now that if he had not been arrested he would have been starved to death. Gambling and the demi-monde were the leading causes which induced Lamirande to plunder the Bank of Poitiers and fly. The expenses of his capture amounted to 12,500f.

FORGETFULNESS.—Much harm is often done through forgetfulness. A little thoughtfulness and care with respect to others would often save them from a great deal of suffering, and aid them in their work. A man is discouraged in consequence of the difficulties he meets with. An encouraging word may be all that is neccessary to revive his energies, and to persevere. That word is easily spoken. There are those who are perfectly willing to speak it, but they do not think of it.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND
IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.
2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.
3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.
4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.
5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.
6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.
7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.
9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.
10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

BEAUTY.

IT is a mistaken idea—though generally prevalent—that everything beautiful in the world is evanescent in its nature, that "all that's bright must fade" quickly, and the brightest and most beautiful objects fade and perish most quickly. "Alas!" says the enthusiastic artist, as he gazes with rapture upon a gorgeous sunset; "how beautiful, but how fleeting! There are but half a dozen such sunsets in a year, and they fade even while I am placing my canvas upon the easel—I can never paint one like nature."

"The leaves are falling from my pretty roses, when it was but yesterday they budded!" exclaims a young girl, as she looks mournfully into her flower-pot.

"Ah!" says the tearful mother, as she places the nosegay of small sweet flowers in the dimpled hands folded upon the bosom of her dead first-born,—"Alas! he was too beautiful to live!"

But though all beautiful things flit past our poor mortal eyes like the sweep of an angel's pinion, giving us but momentary glimpses of the heaven which shall one day smile upon us forever, yet to the vision of the higher intelligences, beauty is always present, and they know that it is eternal. And if we will consider the matter, it is not difficult to conceive this thought.

The earth, as it rolls on its axis and swings in its orbit around the sun, carries on its breast an eternal sunset. If we could pursue the declining orb as fast as it flies, we might constantly see it dip its lower edge into the blue mountains on the horizon. Nay, could we make a sudden spring beyond that horizon and thence look backward as we fly, an eternal sunset would smile in our reverted faces. And among all the clouds that float around in the earth's atmosphere, we should continually behold some turning to crimson and gold, in the slanting beams of the great luminary.

The flowers, too, when they wither in one portion of the earth, spring up afresh in other places, continually girdling the globe with bloom and fragrance. And the human flowers that wither, as it were, before their time, are only translated to other spheres, to blossom always and to live forever in the memory of the fond parent, as such. The mother whose little child died has always a little child in her memory, changeless and beautiful—which, had it lived, might have been stained with the blackness of this world. Let the weeping mother remember that the beauty of her infant has not perished, but was made eternal by the icy touch of death.

And if even this earth is clothed with everlasting beauty, what shall we say when we consider the whole universe of God? What an infinite number of orbs, more grand and beautiful than our own, are flashing in splendor as they roll through space—each with its eternal sunset and sunrise, and its clouds, bathed in a radiance, perhaps, which excels any that ever shone upon earth as greatly as the sun excels a glow-worm in brightness. To those higher intelligences, whose gaze can scan the broad fields of heaven and look down the endless vistas of the stars, how much various beauty must be visible! These scenes, which intoxicate our poor and feeble senses with their fullness, are, in their eyes, but a single tiny spark in the eternal blaze which pervades the boundless empyrean. It may be that all beauteous things are distributed and changed by the angels as they come and go through the ether—that the warm tints which dissolve and fade from the rainbow and the cloud, are instantly transferred to another sphere, and the dying bloom and fragrance of the flowers is caught up as it is exhaled, and shed upon the fields of other planets; that the roses which disease and death steal from the cheek of the maiden we love are given into angel hands to glorify the countenance of some maiden in the stars.

Thus may we learn and believe that when we are raised above the objects which now impede our vision, when death has cleared away the mists which hang before our eyes, we shall realize that beauty is eternal.

ESTATES UPON WHICH LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION HAVE BEEN ISSUED, BUT NO PROPERTY RECEIVED.

Letters of Administration have been issued on the following Estates, but no Money or other Property has come into the possession of the Administrator, nor any Fees received thereon. The Property of several Estates consists of claims to land not yet determined:

Robert Dyson, T. B. McManus, John J. Coombs, C. E. Trask, Wm. F. Hamilton, Charles S. Norris, Huling Major, Horace Cole, James E. Calhoun, J. W. Phipps, Julia W. Burns.

The foregoing report includes all the Estates administered upon by me during the year ending June 30th, 1866.

As a number of the Estates are still unsettled, the amount of Fees cannot be stated, but the same will, on final settlement, be 4 per cent. upon the amount administered in each Estate.

All of which is respectfully submitted,
J. W. BRUMAGIM,
Public Administrator.

LUCY J. PRINCE, Plaintiff, vs. LOUIS M PRINCE, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to LOUIS M. PRINCE, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Hon. Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and awarding to Plaintiff the sole custody of Louis Prince, the child of said parties, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said Plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six.

WM LOEWY, Clerk.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, City and County of San Francisco.—In the Probate Court.

In the matter of the Estate of FRANK O. ELDREDGE, deceased.

Order of publication on application for order of sale.

On reading and filing the petition of John S. Bughee, Administrator, with the will annexed, of the said Estate, praying for an order of sale of the real estate therein described, and it appearing to this Court that there is not sufficient personal estate in the hands of the said Administrator to pay the expenses of administration, and that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate of said deceased for the payment of such debts;

It is ordered, That all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court at the Court-room thereof, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the tenth day of December, 1866, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administrator to sell so much of the real estate of the deceased as shall be necessary to pay such expenses of administration.

And it is further ordered, That a copy of the foregoing order be published once a week for four successive weeks, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper published in the City and County aforesaid.

Dated November 9th, A. D. 1866.

M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, City and County of San Francisco.
I, Wm. Loewy, County Clerk of said City and County, and ex-officio Clerk of the Probate Court thereof, certify the foregoing to be a true copy of the original order on file and of record in my office.

Witness my hand, and the seal of said Probate Court, this ninth day of November, A. D. 1866.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

DANIEL O'NEIL, Plaintiff, vs. JOHN CHAPMAN ET AL, Defendants

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, and the complaint filed in the City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN CHAPMAN, M. LAUFENBERGER, and MARGARET BAUSCH, Defendants.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, a copy of which accompanies this Summons, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this Judicial district, within twenty days or if served out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage, described in the complaint, and executed by the said John Chapman on the first day of May, A. D. 1866, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note of even date therewith, made and executed by the said Defendant Chapman, whereby he promised to pay to the Plaintiff the sum of two thousand dollars in gold coin of the United States, three years from the date of the said note, with interest thereon at the rate of one per cent. per month, payable quarterly in gold coin, that is to say, at the end of every three months: and in case default be made in the payment of the said interest, or any part thereof, when the same becomes due, then the whole of the said principal and interest shall be due; that the premises conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment, in United States gold coin, of said sum of $2,000, with interest thereon according to the terms of said note, and the costs of suit; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said John Chapman for the balance remaining due, and also that the said Defendant, and all persons claiming by, through or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right, title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest in and to said mortgaged premises, and for other and further relief.

And if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the Plaintiff will take default against you, and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District, this second day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six. WM. LOEWY, Clerk

POETRY—
How I Love to Think o' Thee, Mary, —By James Linen.
Allegory of the Convolvulus,—By Wm. Carey Jones:

[For the Californian.]

HOW I LOVE TO THINK O' THEE, MARY.

WHEN nature tak's her winter nap
In her cauld white sheets o' snaw,
Or when the wild weird whistlin' winds
Roun' the auld clay biggin blaw,
An' meltin' rains an' roarin' floods
A' the strong ice-fetters thaw—
How I love to dream o' thee, Mary!
How I love to dream o' thee!

When tender shoots an' burstin' buds
On the orchard trees are hung;
When wee birds build their cosie nests,
Whaur the auld anes feed their young—
An' hills an' valleys ring wi joy
As they aft before hae rung—
How I love to dream o' thee, Mary!
How I love to dream o' thee!

When the thorn is white wi' blossoms,
An' the bloom is on the pea;
When bonnie golden buttercups,
An' the gowans gem the lea,
An' kindred tribes in sylvan groves
Sing on ilka bush an' tree—
How I love to dream o' thee, Mary!
How I love to dream o' thee!

When bleatin' hills an' vocal glens
Lie bathed in glittering sheen,
Ere gloamin' casts a dusky veil
O'er the fields o' wavin' green,
Or lovers meet to pledge their vows
At the trystin' time o' e'en—
How I love to dream o' thee, Mary!
How I love to dream o' thee!

When the flowers a' droop an' wither,
Despite the dews that gently fa';
When the yellow hairsts are gathered in,
An' the swallows flee awa';
When the nichts are lang an' drearie,
An' a gloom hangs over a'—
How I love to dream o' thee, Mary!
How I love to dream o' thee!

SAN FRANCISCO, November, 1866. JAMES LINEN.

THE GAME OF SPECULATION IN BOMBAY.—The Spectator, in an article on the history of Bombay during the American war, points out how terrible was the misuse made of the Anglo-Indians of the most marvellous prosperity which, perhaps, suddenly befel a people. In the year 1860–1 the quantity of cotton exported from Bombay was about 355,000,000 pounds, valued at under £7,000,000. In 1864–5 the quantity was very little, only 25,000,000 pounds higher, yet the value was £30,375,000—i. e., while the quantity increased only 7 per cent., the value increased 300 per cent. What did the Bombay traders do with this enormous increase of prosperity? They not only squandered it in the maddest speculation, but ruined themselves. That which should have been their advantage, they turned to their destruction.

THE delicacy of some of the ornamental cast-iron work, known as Berlin iron is such, that it requires of some pieces ten thousand to weigh one pound.

OUR thanks are due to J. W. Bingham, City Clerk, for a copy of the Municipal Reports for the year ending June 30, 1866, just published.

BLACK SHEEP

BY EDMUND YATES,

Author of "Land at Last," "Kissing the Rod," etc.

FROM CHARLES DICKENS' MAGAZINE, "ALL THE YEAR ROUND."

SUMMARY OF PUBLISHED PORTIONS OF "BLACK SHEEP."—George Dallas, the black sheep of the family, an only son and spendthrift, walks down from London to "Poynings,"—the Carruthers' country seat—to seek an interview with his mother—now Mrs. Carruthers, "wife of the rich, respectable old Carruthers," who had forbidden him the house—to obtain money from her to meet pressing difficulties. He arrives on the night of a party; climbs up into the room of his old nurse, Mrs. Brookes, and obtains there a stolen interview with his mother, which results in his obtaining a ten-pound note, and a promise that she will forward him, within one month, a hundred and forty pounds, to meet a note of indebtedness to one Routh, a friend and associate. After an interview of half an hour he leaves for the adjacent village of Amherst, where he passes the night. In the morning he changes the note, which bears a date and the post-mark of Amherst, to purchase an overcoat, and departs for London. In London, at the house of Stewart Routh, a gentlemanly gambler and adventurer of good accomplishments and address, the reader is introduced to his wife Harriet, commonly addressed by Routh as "Harry,"—a woman of rare mental qualifications and quick appreciation, thoroughly devoted to her husband, his counselor in all his schemes, and a most efficient aid in his precarious mode of living.

One Deane, an American, a cool, sharp, "posted" man, with abundant means, is also introduced, whose cleverness is even too much for the designs of Routh and his wife. George Dallas receives a letter from his mother, who writes him that the one hundred and forty pounds, obtained by a great risk and almost criminal sacrilice, will be given to him by her in person at Amherst. He informs Routh of the import of his mother's letter. Routh, meanwhile, is organizing a company for working some newly discovered silver mines in Brazil, which promises to be "a big thing," but is badly in want of funds to successfully launch his scheme; when he learns from Deane that he is to receive for some stock transaction three thousand pounds, which sum Deane proposes to keep in his desk for a few days until wanted; and, in celebration of the event, he invites Routh and Dallas to dine with him at a fashionable restaurant on the same evening. Routh tells his wife that he must have Deane's money "one way or another." The dinner comes off, but Routh is not present.

CHAPTER VII.

DELAY.

GEORGE DALLAS felt that his fortunes were in the ascendant, when he arose on the morning following the dinner with Deane, and found himself possessed of ten pounds, which he had been sufficiently sober to win at billiards the previous night, and consequently in a position to pay off his landlady, and turn his back upon the wretched lodging, which her temper, tyranny, and meanness had made more wretched. He lost no time in packing up the few articles he possessed—mainly consisting of books and drawing materials—and these, together with his scanty wardrobe, he threw into a couple of trunks, which he himself carried down the steep dark staircase and deposited in a cab. The landlady stood at the door, in the gray morning, and watched her late lodger, as he strode down the shabby little street, followed by the luggage-laden cab. She watched him, wondering. She wondered where he had got the money he had just paid her. She wondered where he had got the money to pay an extra week's rent, in default of a week's notice. When she had dunned him yesterdao, as rudely and mercilessly as usual, he had said nothing indicative of an expectation of an immediate supply of money. He had only said that he hoped to pay her soon. "Where did he get the money?" the old woman thought, as she watched him. "I hope he come by it honest. I wonder where he's going to. He did not tell the cabman, leastways so as I could hear him. Ah! It aint no business of mine; I'll just turn the rooms out a bit, and put up the bill."

So Mrs. Gunther (for that was the lady's name) re entered the shabby house, and a great activity accompanied by perpetual scolding pervaded it for some hours, during which the late tenant was journeying down to Amherst.

George Dallas strictly observed the directions contained in his mother's letter, and having started by an early train, reached Amherst at noon. Rightly supposing that at such an hour it would be useless to look for his mother in the little town, he crossed the railroad in a direction leading away from Amherst, struck into some fields, and wandered on by a rough footpath which led through a copse of beech-trees to a round bare hill. He sat down when he had reached this spot, from whence he could see the road to and from Poynings. A turnpike was at a little distance, and he saw a carriage stopped beside the gate, and a footman at the door receiving an order from a lady, whose bonnet he could just discern in the distance. He stood up and waited. The carriage approached, and he saw that the liveries were those of Mr. Carruthers. Then he struck away down the side of the little declivity, and crossing the railway at another point, attained the main street of the little town. It was market-day. He avoided the inn, and took up a position whence he could watch his mother's approach. There were so many strangers and what Mr. Deane would have called "loafers" about, some buying, some selling, and many honestly and unfeignedly doing nothing, that an idler more or less was certain to pass without any comment, and it was not even necessary to keep very wide of the inn. He stood with his hands in his pockets, looking into the window of the one shop in Amherst devoted to the interests of literature, which was profusely decorated with out-of-date valentines, much criticised by flies, and with feebly embossed cards, setting forth the merits of local governesses. At that time prophetic representations of the International Exhibition of '62 were beginning to appeal to the patriotic soul in light-blue drawings, with flags innumerable displayed wheresoever they could be put "handy." George Dallas calmly and gravely surveyed the stock-in-trade, rather distracted by the process of watching the inn door, between which and his position intervened a group of farmers, who were to a man chewing bits of whipcord, and examining samples of corn, which they extracted in a stealthy manner from their breeches-pocket, and displayed grudgingly on their broad palms. On the steps of the inn door were one or two busy groups, and not a man or woman of the number took any notice of Mrs. Carruthers' son. They took very considerable notice of Mrs. Carruthers herself, however, when her carriage stopped; and Mr. Page, the landlord, actually came out, quite in the old-fashioned style, to open the lady's carriage, and escort her into the house. George watched his mother's tall and elegant figure, as long as she was in sight, with mingled feelings of pleasure, affection, something like real gratitude, and very real bitterness; then he turned, strolled past the inn where the carriage was being put up, and took his way down the main street, to the principal draper's shop. He went in, asked for some gloves, and turned over the packets set before him with slowness and indecision. Presently his mother entered, and took the seat which the shopman, a mild person in spectacles, handed her. She, too, asked for gloves, and, as the shopman turned his back to the counter, rapidly passed a slip of paper to her son. She had written on it, in pencil—

"At Davis, the dentist's, opposite, in ten minutes."

"These will do, thank you. I think you said three and sixpence?" said George to the shopman, who, having placed a number of gloves before Mrs. Carruthers for her selection, had now leisure to attend to his less important customer.

"Yes, sir, three and sixpence, sir. One pair, sir? You'll find them very good wear, sir."

"One pair will do, thank you," said George. He looked steadily at his mother, as he passed her on his way to the door, and once more anger arose, fierce and keen, in his heart—anger, not directed against her, but against his step-father. "Curse him!" he muttered, as he crossed the street; "what right has he to treat me like a dog, and her like a slave? Nothing that I have done justifies—no, by Heaven, and nothing that I could do would justify—such treatment."

Mr. Davis's house had the snug, cleanly, inflexible look peculiarly noticeable even amid the general snugness, cleanliness, and inflexibility of a country town, as attributes of the residences of surgeons and dentists, and gentlemen who combine both those fine arts. The clean servant, who opened the door, looked perfectly cheerful and content. It is rather aggravating, when one is going to be tortured, even for one's ultimate good, to be assured in a tone almost of glee—

"No, sir, master's not in, sir; but he'll be in directly, sir. In the waiting room, sir." George Dallas not having come to be tortured, and not wishing to see Mr. Davis, bore the announcement with good-humor equal to that of the servant, and sat down very contentedly on a high, hard horsehair chair, to await events. Fortune again favored him; the room had no other occupant; and in about five minutes he again heard the cheerful voice of the beaming girl at the door say—

"No, m'm, master's not in; but he'll be in d'rectly m'm. In the waiting-room, m'm. There's one gentleman a-waitin', m'm, but master will attend on you first, of course, m'm."

The next moment his mother was in the room, her face shining on him, her arms round him, and the kind words of the truest friend any human being can be to another, poured into his ear.

"You are looking much better, George," she said, holding him back from her, and gazing fondly into his face. "You are looking brighter, my darling, and softer, and as if you were trying to keep your word to me."

"Pretty well, mother, and I am very thankful to you. But your letter puzzled me. What does it mean? Have you really got the money, and how did you manage to get it?"

"I have not got it, dear," she said, quickly, and holding up her hand to keep him silent, "but it is only a short delay, not a disappointment. I shall have it in two or three days."

George's countenance had fallen at her first words, but the remainder of the sentence reassured him, and he listened eagerly as she continued—

"I am quite sure of getting it, George. If it does but set you free, I shall not regret the price I have paid for it."

"Tell me what it is, mother," George asked, eagerly. "Stay, you must not sit so close to me."

"I'm not sure that your voice ought to be heard either, speaking so familiarly, tête-á-tête with the important Mrs. Carruthers of Poynings—a personage whose sayings and doings are things of note at Amherst," said Mrs. Carruthers, with a smile, as she took a seat at a little distance, and placed one of the samples of periodical literature strewn about the table, after the fashion of dentists' and surgeons' waiting-rooms, ready to her hand, in case of interruption. Then she laid her clasped hands on the table, and leaned against them, with her clear dark eyes fixed upon her son's face, and her steady voice, still sweet and pure in its tones as in her youth, as she told him what she had done.

"Do you remember, George, that on that wretched night you spoke of my diamonds, and seemed to reproach me that I should wear jewels, while you wanted so urgently but a small portion of their price?"

"I remember, mother," returned George, frowning, "and a beast I was to hint such a thing to you, who gave me all that ever was your own! I hoped you had forgiven and forgotten it. Can it be possible that you have sold— But no; you said they were family jewels?"

"I will tell you. When you had gone away that night, and I was in the ball-room, and later, when I was in my dressing-room alone, and could think of it all again, the remembrance of what you had said tormented me. The jewels you had seen me wearing were, indeed, as I had told you, not my own; nevertheless, the remembrance of all I had ever read about converting jewels into money occupied my mind that night, and occupied it after that night for days and days. One day, Mr. Tatham came to Poynings, and in the evening, being, as he always is, very entertaining, he related an extraordinary story of a client of his. The tale, as he told it had many particulars, but one caught my attention. The client was a woman of large fortune, who married for love a man much younger than herself, a dissipated fellow who broke her fortune, and might have broken her heart, but for his getting killed in riding a steeple chase. After his timely death, it was discovered, among a variety of dishonorable transactions, that he had stolen his wife's diamonds, with the connivance of her maid; had had them imitated in mock stones by a famous French dealer in false jewelry; and had substituted the false for the real. No suspicion of the fact had ever crossed his wife's mind. The discovery was made by the jeweler's bill for the imitation being found among his papers. This led to inquiry of the dealer, who gave the required information. The moment I heard the story, I conceived the idea of getting you the money you wanted by a similar expedient."

"O mother!"

She lifted one hand with a gesture of caution, and continued, in a voice still lower than before—

"My jewels—at least those I have sold—were my own, George. Those I wore that night were, as I told you, family diamonds; but Mr. Carruthers gave me, when we were married, a diamond bracelet, and I understood then that it was very valuable. I shrank from such a deception. But it was for you, and I caught at it."

George Dallas sat with his hands over his face, and no more interrupted her by a single word.

"By one or two questions I stimulated Mr. Carruthers' curiosity in the strange story, so that he asked Mr. Tatham several questions, as to where the mock jewels were made, whether they cost much, and, in fact, procured for me all the information I required. That bracelet was the only thing I had of sufficient value for the purpose, because it is expensive to get an imitation of any ornament made of very fine stones, as my bracelet is, and richly set. If the act were still to do, I should do it, George—for you; and still I should feel, as I do most bitterly feel, that in doing it I shamefully deceive my husband!"

Still George Dallas did not speak. He felt keenly the degradation to which he had reduced his mother; but so great and pervading was his bitterness of feeling towards his mother's husband, that when the wrong to him presented itself to his consideration, he would not entertain it. He turned away, rose, and paced the room. His mother sighed heavily as she went on.

"George, you know this is not the first time I have suffered through and for you, and that this is the first time I have ever done an act which I dare not avow. I will say no more."

He was passing behind her chair as she spoke, and he paused in his restless walk to kneel down by her, clasp her in his arms and kiss her. As he rose from his knees, she looked at him with a face made radiant with hope, and with a mother's love.

"This is how it was done, George," she continued. "I wrote to an old friend of mine in Paris, a French lady, once my schoolfellow. I told her I wanted my bracelet matched, in the best manner of imitation jewelry, as our English fashions required two, and I could not afford to purchase another made of real diamonds. I urged the strictest secrecy, and I know she will observe it; for she loves mystery only a little less than she loves dress. She undertook the commission with alacrity, and I expected to have had both the bracelets yesterday."

"What a risk you would have run, mother, supposing an occasion for your wearing the bracelet had arisen!"

"Like Anne of Austria and the studs?" said his mother, with a smile. "But there was no help for it. More deceit and falsehood must have followed the first. If the occasion had arisen, Mr. Carruthers would have questioned me, and I should have said I had sent it to be cleaned, when he would have been angry that I should have done so without consulting him."

"Tyrannical old brute!" was George's mental comment.

"All the meanness and all the falsehood was planned and ready, George; but it was needless. Mr. Carruthers was summoned to York, and is still there. It is much for me that the parcel should arrive during his absence. I heard from my friend, the day before I wrote to you, that she was about to send it immediately, and I wrote to you at once. It is to be directed to Nurse Brookes."

"How did you explain that, mother?" George asked, quickly.

"More lies, more lies," she answered, sadly, rejoicing in her heart the while to see how he writhed under the words. "I told her what was needful in the way of false explanation, and I made certain of having the bracelets to-day. So I must have done but for a second letter from my friend Madame de Haulleville, to the effect that, having a sudden opportunity of sending the packet to England by a private hand, she had availed herself of it, at the loss of (at most, she writes) a day or two."

"Confound her French parsimony!" said George, "think of the unnecessary risk she makes us run, when I come down here for nothing."

"It is not so much parsimony as precaution, George. And she could know nothing of any risk."

"What is to be done, then?" he asked, in a softer tone.

"Can you not remain at Amherst?" asked his mother. "Have you anything to do which will prevent your remaining here for a day or two? If not, you will be as well here as in London, for there is no danger of Mr. Carruthers seeing you."

"Suppose he did?" George burst out. "Is he the lord and master of all England, including Amherst? Perhaps the sunshine belongs to him, and the fresh air? If I keep away from Poynings, that's enough for him, surely."

Mrs. Carruthers had risen, and looked appealingly at him.

"Remember, George, your misconduct would justify Mr. Carruthers, in the eyes of the world, for the course he has taken towards you: or," here she moved near to him, and laid her hand on his arm, "if you refuse to consider that, remember that Mr. Carruthers is my husband, and that I love him."

"I will, mother, I will," said George, impetuously. "Graceless, ungrateful wretch that I am! I will never say another word against him. I will remain quietly here, as you suggest. Shall I stay at the inn? Not under my own name; under my not very well known but some day of course widely to be famous pen name—Paul Ward. Don't forget it, mother, write it down; stay, I'll write it for you. P-a-u-l W-a-r-d." He wrote the name slowly on a slip of paper, which Mrs. Carruthers placed between the leaves of her pocket-book.

"You must go now," she said to him: it is impossible you can wait here longer. We have been singularly fortunate as it is. When I write, I will tell you whether I can come to you here—in the town, I mean—or whether you shall come to me. I think you will have to come to me. Now go, my darling boy." She embraced him fondly.

"And you, mother?"

"I will remain here a little longer. I have really something to say to Mr. Davis."

He went. Black care went with him, and shame and remorse were busy at his heart. Would remorse deepen repentance, and would repentance bear wholesome fruit of reformation? That was for the future to unravel. The present had acute stinging pain in it, which he longed to stifle, to crush out, to get away from anyhow. He loved his mother, and her beautiful, earnest face went with him along the dusty road; the unshed tears in her clear dark eyes seemed to drop in burning rain upon his heart; the pleading tones of her sorrowful voice filled all the air. How wicked and wretched, how vain, silly, and insipid, how worthless, and vulgar, all his pleasures and pursuits seemed now! A new spirit arose in the wayworn, jaded man; a fresh ambition sprang up in his heart. "It's a wretched, low, mean way of getting free, but I have left myself no choice. I must take advantage of what she has done for me, and then I never will wrong her love and generosity again. I will do right, and not wrong; this is my resolution, and I will work it out, so help me God!"

He had unconsciously come to a stop at the noble old oak gates, flung hospitably open, of a wide spreading park, through one of whose vistas a grand old mansion in the most elaborate manner of the Elizabethan style was visible. He looked up, and the beauty of the prospect struck him as if it had been created by an enchanter's wand. He looked back along the road by which he had come, and found that he had completely lost sight of Amherst.

He went a pace or two beyond the gate pillars. A hale old man was employed in nailing up a trailing branch of jessamine against the porch of the lodge.

"Good afternoon, old gentleman. This is a fine place, I fancy."

"Good afternoon, sir. It is a fine place. You'll not see many finer in Amherst. Would you like to walk through it, sir? You're quite welcome."

"Thank you. I should like to walk through it. I have never been down this way before. What is the name of the place, and to whom does it belong?"

"It is called the Sycamores, sir, and it belongs to Sir Thomas Boldero."

CHAPTER VII.

AMONG THE BEECHES.

A fine avenue of beech-trees led from the gate through which George Dallas had passed, to the house which had attracted his admiration. These grandest and most beautiful of trees were not, however, the distinguishing feature of the place; not its chief pride. "The Sycamores" was so called in honor of a profusion of trees of that kind, said in the neighborhood to have no rivals in all England. Be that as it might, the woodland scenery in Sir Thomas Boldero's noble park was beautiful in the highest degree, and of such beauty George Dallas was keenly and artistically appreciative. The tender loveliness of the spring was abroad throughout the land; its voices, its gladness, its perfumes, were around him everywhere, and as the young man strolled on under the shadow of the great branches, bearing their tender burden of bright, soft, green, half unclosed buds, the weight and blackness of care seemed to be lifted off him, and his heart opened to fresh, pure, simple aspirations, long strangers to his jaded but not wholly vitiated character. He was very young, and the blessed influence of youth told upon him, its power of receiving impressions, its faculty of enjoyment, its susceptibility to external things—a blessing or a curse as it is used—its buoyancy, its hopefulness. As George Dallas turned from the broad smooth carriage way, and went wandering over the green elastic turf of the carefully kept park, winding in and out through the boles of the grand old trees, treading now on a tender twig again on a wild flower, now startling from her nest a brooding lark, anon stopping to listen to a burst of melody from some songster free from domestic cares, he was hardly recognizable as the man who had sat listening to Philip Deane's hard, worldly talk at the Strand tavern the day before.

"Brighter and softer" his mother had said he was looking, and it was true. Brighter and softer still the hard, pleasure-wearied, joyless face became, as the minutes stole over him, among the sycamores and beeches. He had pursued his desultory path a mile or more, and had lost sight of the house and the avenue, when he came to a beautiful open glade, carpeted with turf of the softest green, and overarched by forest trees. Looking down its long vista, he saw that it terminated with a brilliant flower garden, and a portion of a noble stone terrace, lying beneath one side of the many-turreted house. He stood entranced by the beauty of the scene, and, after a few moments, felt in his pocket for pencil and paper, in order to sketch it. He found both, and looking round him, saw a piece of the trunk of a felled tree, not yet removed by the care of the forester.

"A capital place to sketch from," thought George, as he folded his coat, and laid it upon the convenient block, and immediately became absorbed in his occupation. He was proceeding rapidly with his sketch, and feeling rather disposed to get it finished as quickly as he could, in order that he might return to the inn and procure some food, of which he stood in considerable need, when he caught the sound of a galloping upon the turf in the distance behind him. He raised his head and listened; there it was, the dull, rapid thud of hoofs upon the grass. Was there one rider, or was there more? He listened again—only one, he thought; and now the rapid noise ceased, and was succeeded by the slow, pattering sound of a horse, ridden daintily and gently about and about, guided by a capricious fancy. Still George listened and presently there came riding out of the shadowy distance into the full expanse of the glade, down which the declining sun sent golden rays, as if in salutation, a lady, who was, as his first glance showed him, young and beautiful. She was quite unconscious of his presence, for the piece of timber on which he had been sitting was out of the line of sight, and though he had risen, he was still standing beside it. She came towards him, her slight form swaying to the movements of her bright bay thoroughbred, as she put the animal through all sorts of fanciful paces, now checking him with the rein now encouraging him with her clear, sweet young voice, and patting his arched neck with her white gloved hand. The young man looked out from his hiding place, enraptured, as she came on, a vision of youth, beauty, and refinement, down the wide green glade, the sun shining on her, the birds singing, the flowers blooming for her, the proud walls of the old house rising grandly in the background, as if in boast of the worthy shelter that awaited her. Nearer and nearer she came, and now George Dallas could see her face distinctly, and could hear the pretty words with which she coaxed her horse. It was a face to remember; a face to be the happier for having seen; a face whose beauty was blended of form and color, of soul, feature, and expression; a face which had all that the earth has to give of its best and fairest, touched with the glory which is higher and better, which earth has not to bestow. It was the face of a girl of nineteen; whose clear eyes were of golden brown, whose cheeks bloomed with the purest, most varying flower like color, whose rich golden hair shone in the sunlight, as its braids rippled and turned about with the movement of her head, tossed childishly to the rhythmical measure of her horse's head.

Half a dozen trees only intervened between her and the spot where George Dallas stood, greedily watching her every movement and glance, when she took her hat off, and pushed the heavy golden hair off her broad white forehead. At that moment, the horse jerked the rein she held loosely, and pulled her slightly forward, the hat falling from her hand on the grass.

"Now see what you have done," she said, with a gay laugh, as the animal stood still and looked foolish. "I declare I'll make you pick it up with your mouth. There, sir, turn, I tell you; come, you know how." And she put the horse through all the pretty tricks of stooping and half kneeling, in which she evidently felt much more pleasure than he did. But she did not succeed; he obeyed touch and word readily; but he did not pick up the hat. At last she desisted, and said, with a funny look of mock patience—

"Very well, Sir Lancelot, if you won't you won't, so I must get off." She had just gathered her skirt in her hand, and was about to spring from her saddle, when George Dallas stepped out from among the trees, picked up the hat, and handed it to her, with a bow.

The young lady looked at him in astonishment, but she thanked him with self-possession, which he was far from sharing, and put her hat on, while Sir Lancelot pawed impatiently.

"Thank you," she said; "I did not see any one near."

"I was sitting yonder," said George Dallas, pointing to the spot whence he had emerged, "on some fallen timber, and was just taking the liberty of sketching the view of the house, when you rode up."

She colored, looked pleased and interested, and said, hesitatingly, having bidden Sir Lancelot "stand—"

"You are an artist sir?"

"No," he answered, "at least, only in a very small way; but this is such a beautiful place, I was tempted to make a little sketch. But I fear I am intruding; perhaps strangers are not admitted."

"O, yes, they are," she replied, hurriedly. "We have not many strangers in this neighborhood; but they are all welcome to come into the park, if they like. Had you finished your sketch?" she asked, timidly, with a look towards the sheet of paper, which had fallen when Dallas rose, and had been fluttered into sight by the gentle wind. George saw the look, and caught eagerly at any pretext for prolonging the interview a few moments.

"May I venture to show you my poor attempt?" he asked, and without awaiting her answer, he stepped quickly back to the place he had left. The girl walked her horse gently forward, and as he stooped for the paper, she was beside him, and, lifting his head, he caught for a moment the full placid gaze of her limpid eyes. He reddened under the look, full of gentleness and interest as it was, and a pang shot through his heart, with the swift thought, that once he might have met such a woman as this on equal terms, and might have striven with the highest and proudest for her favor. That was all over now; but at least he, even he, might sun himself in the brief light of her presence. She laid the rein on Sir Lancelot's neck, and took the little drawing from his hand with a timid expression of thanks.

"I am no judge," she said, when she had looked at it, and he had looked at her, his whole soul in his eyes; "but I think it is very nicely done. Would you not like to finish it? Or perhaps there are some other points of view you would like to take? I am sure my uncle, Sir Thomas Boldero, would be delighted to give you every facility. He is very fond of art, and—and takes a great interest in artists"

"You are very kind," said Dallas. "I shall be at Amherst a day or two longer, and I will take the liberty of making a few sketches—that splendid group of sycamores, for instance."

"Ah, yes," she said, laughing "I call them the godfathers and godmothers of the park. They would make a pretty picture. I tried to draw them once, myself, but you cannot imagine what a mess I made of it."

"Indeed," said Dallas, with a smile, "and why am I to be supposed unable to imagine a failure?"

"Because you are an artist," she said, with charming archness and simplicity, "and, of course, do everything well."

This simple exhibition of faith in artists amused Dallas, to whom this girl was a sort of revelation of the possibilities of beauty, innocence, and naiveté.

"Of course," he replied, gravely; "nevertheless, I fear I shall not do justice to the sycamores."

And now came an inevitable pause, and he expected she would dismiss him and ride away, but she did not. It was not that she had any of the awkward want of manner which makes it difficult to terminate a chance interview, for she was perfectly graceful and self possessed, and her manner was as far removed from clumsiness as from boldness. The girl was thinking during the pause whose termination Dallas dreaded. After a little, she said—

"There is a very fine picture gallery at the Sycamores, and I am sure it would give my uncle great pleasure to show it to you. Whenever any gentlemen from London are staying at Amherst, or passing through, Mr. Page at the inn tells them about the picture gallery, and they come to see it, if they care about such things; perhaps it was he who told you?"

"No," said Dallas, "I am not indebted for the pleasure—for the happiness—of this day to Mr. Page. No one guided me here, but I happened to pass the gate, and a very civil old gentleman, who was doing some gardening at the lodge, asked me in." His looks said more than his words dared to express, of the feelings with which his chance visit had inspired him But the girl did not see his looks; she was idly playing with Sir Lancelot's mane, and thinking.

"Well," she said, at last, settling herself in the saddle in a way unmistakably preliminary to departure. "If you would like to see the picture gallery, and will walk round that way, through those trees, to the front of the house"—she pointed out the direction with the handle of her riding-whip—"I will go on before, and tell my uncle he is about to have a visitor to inspect his treasures."

"You are very kind," said Dallas, earnestly, "and you offer me a very great pleasure. But Sir Thomas Boldero may be engaged—may think it an intrusion."

"And a thousand other English reasons for not accepting at once a civility frankly offered," said the girl, with a delightful laugh. "I assure you, I could not gratify my uncle more than by picking up a stray connoisseur; or my aunt than by bringing to her a gentleman of sufficient taste to admire her trees and flowers."

"And her niece, Miss Carruthers," thought George Dallas

"So pray go round to the house. Don't forget your coat. I see it upon the ground—there. It has got rubbed against the damp bark, and there's a great patch of green upon it."

"That's of no consequence," said George, gayly; "it's only an Amherst coat, and no beauty."

"You must not make little of Amherst," said the girl, with mock gravity, as George stood rubbing the green stain off his coat with his handkerchief; "we regard the town here as a kind of metropolis, and have profound faith in the shops and all to be purchased therein. Did dear old Evans make that coat?"

"A venerable person of that name sold it to me," returned George, who had now thrown the coat over his arm, and stood, hat in hand, beside her horse.

"The dear! I should not mind letting him make me a habit," she said. "Good bye for the present—that way," again she pointed with her whip, and then cantered easily off, leaving George in a state of mind which he would have found it very difficult to define, so conflicting were his thoughts and emotions. He looked after her, until the last flutter of her skirt was lost in the distance, and then he struck into the path which she had indicated, and pursued it, musing

"And that is Clare Carruthers! I thought I had seen that head before, that graceful neck, that crown of golden hair. Yes, it is she: and little she thinks whom she is about to bring into her uncle's house—the outcast and exile from Poynings! I will see it out; why should I not? I owe nothing to Carruthers that I should avoid this fair, sweet girl, because he chooses to banish me from her presence. What a presence it is! What am I that I should come into it?" He paused a moment, and a bitter tide of remembrance and self-reproach rushed over him, almost overwhelming him. Then he went on more quickly, and with a flushed cheek and heated brow, for anger was again rising within him. "You are very clever as well as very obstinate, my worthy step-father, but you are not omnipotent yet. Your darling niece, the beauty, the heiress, the great lady, the treasure of price to be kept from the sight of me, from the very knowledge of anything so vile and lost, has met me, in the light of day, not by any device of mine, and has spoken to me, not in strained, forced courtesy, but of her own free will. What would you think of that, I wonder, if you knew it! And my mother? If the girl should ask my name, and should tell my mother of her chance meeting with a wandering artist, one Paul Ward, what will my mother think?—my dear conscientious mother, who has done for me what wounds her conscience so severely, and who will feel as if it were wounded afresh by this accidental meeting, with which she has nothing in the world to do." He lifted his hat, and fanned his face with it. His eyes were gleaming, his color had risen; he looked strong, daring, active, and handsome—a man whom an innocent girl, all unlearned in life and in the world's ways, might well exalt in her guileless fancy into a hero, and be pardoned her mistake by older, sadder, and wiser heads.

THE WAY TO SPOIL GIRLS.

IF any parent wishes a receipt how to spoil a daughter, it can be easily and readily given, and can be proved by the experience of hundreds to be certain and efficacious.

1. Be always telling her, from earliest childhood, what a beautiful creature she is. It is a capital way of inflating the vanity of a little girl to be constantly exclaiming "How pretty!" Children understand such flattery even when in the nurse's arms, and the evil is done to the character in its earliest formation.

2. Begin as soon as she can toddle, to dress her out in fashionable clothes and rich dresses. Put a hoop upon her at once with all the artificial adornments of flounces, and feathers, and flowers, and curls. Fondness for dress will thus become a prominent characteristic, and will usurp the whole attention of the young mortal, and be a long step toward spoiling her.

3. Let her visit so much that she finds no happiness at home, and therefore will not be apt to stay there and learn home duties. It is a capital thing for a spoiled daughter to seek all her happiness in visiting and changing of place and associates. She will thus grow as useless as modern fashionable parents delight that their daughters should be.

4. Be careful that her education gives her a smattering of all the accomplishments, without the slightest knowledge of things really useful in life. If her mind and time are occupied in modern accomplishments, there will be no thought of the necessity and virtue of being of some real use to somebody pervading her heart, and she will be soon ready as a spoiled daughter.

5. As a consequence, keep her in profound ignorance of all the useful arts of housekeeping, impressing upon her mind that it is vulgar to do anything for yourself, or to learn how anything is done in the house. A spoiled daughter should never be taught the mysteries of the kitchen; such things a lady leaves to the servants. It would be "vulgar" for her to know how to dress salad, or make a pudding. As a mistress of a house, it is her duty to sit on a sofa all day in the midst of a pyramid of silks and flounces, reading the last new novel, while her domestics are performing the labor of the house.

6. To complete the happiness of your spoiled daughter, marry her to a bearded youth with soft hands, who knows as little how to earn money as she does to save it. Her happiness will then be finished for lifetime.

A CHILD'S LAUGHTER.—Is there anything like the ringing laugh of an innocent, happy child? Can any other music so echo in the heart's inner chambers? It is sympathetic, too, beyond all other melodies. When the father sits absorbed over his book, which seems to concentrate every faculty, he hears his little boy laughing in his sport, and laughs also, he knows not wherefore. The bright being, constantly gathering intelligence, casts around us gems of thought and pearls of affection, till our paths seem paved with precious stones from heaven's treasury. No day of storm is dark where he is—no wintry evening long. A young child is a full fountain of delight to the house and heart.

EXTRAVAGANCE.—Those who denounce women's extravagance should read this: "A London shirt-maker has just finished a dozen shirts for a gentleman, the price of which is one hundred and twenty pounds. They are, it is stated, of the finest cambric, and have fronts embroidered with gold threads."

THE DANCE OF DEATH.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GOETHE—BY THEODORE MARTIN.

THE warder looked down at the dead of night
On the graves where the dead were sleeping,
And clearly as day was the pale moonlight
O'er the quiet churchyard creeping.
One after another the grave-stones began
To heave und to open, and woman und man
Rose up in their ghastly apparel!

Ho, ho, for the dance!—and the phantoms outsprung,
In skeleton roundel advancing,
The rich and the poor, and the old and the young,
But the winding-sheets hindered their dancing.
No shame had these revelers, wasted and grim,
So they shook off the cerements from body and limb,
And scattered them o'er the hillocks.

They crooked their thigh-bones, and they shook their long shanks,
And wild was their reeling and limber;
And each bone, as it crosses, it clinks and it clanks,
Like the clapping of timber on timber.
The warder he laughed, though his laugh was not loud·
And the Fiend whispered to him—"Go, steal me the shroud
Of one of these skeleton dancers."

He has done it!—and hackward, with terrified glance,
To the sheltering door ran the warder;
As calm as before looked the moon on the dance,
Which they footed in hideous order.
But one and another, retiring at last,
Slipped on their white garments, and onward they passed,
And a hush settled over the green-sward.

Still, one of them stumbles and tumbles along,
And taps at each tomb that it seizes;
But 'tis none of its mates that has done it this wrong,
For it scents its grave-clothes in the breezes;
It shakes the tower gate, but that drives it away,
For 'twas nailed o'er with crosses—a goodly array—
And well was it so for the warder!

It must have its shroud—it must have it betimes—
The quaint Gothic carving it catches,
And upward from story to story it climbs,
And scrumbles with leaps and with snatches.
Now wo to the warder, poor sinner, betides!
Like a spindle-legged spider the skeleton strides
From buttress to buttress, still upward!

The warder he shook, and the warder grew pale,
And gladly the shroud would have yielded:
The ghost had its clutch on the last iron rail,
Which the top of the watch-tower shielded,
When the moon was obscured by the rush of a cloud—
One! thundered the bell, and, unswathed by a shroud,
Down went the gaunt skeleton crashing!

THE BUGLE SONG.

THE splendor falls on castle walls,
And snowy summits old in story;
The long light shakes across the lakes
And the wild cataract leaps in glory.
Blow, buggle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
Blow, buggle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O hark, O hear! how thin and clear,
And thinner, clearer, farther going!
O sweet and far from cliff and scar
The horns of Elfland faintly blowing!
Blow, let us hear the purple glens replying:
Blow, buggle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O love, they die in yon rich sky,
They faint on hill or field or river:
Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow forever and forever.
Blow, buggle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying.

TENNYSON.

KISSES.—Kisses, like the faces of philosophers, vary. Some are as hot as a coal of fire, some as sweet as honey, some as mild as milk, some as tasteless as long drawn soda. Stolen kisses are said to have more nutmeg and cream than any other sort. As to proposed kisses they are not liked at all.

THE eye alone cannot appreciate true beauty, for it does not consist in mere physical moulding. The understanding must aid. And what may give exquisite pleasure to the cultivated understanding may fail of making any impression on the vulgar.

TIME is the only gift in which God has stinted us; for He never intrusts us with a second moment till He has taken away the first, and never leaves us certain of a third.—Fenelon.

CENSURE is the most effectual when mixed with praise. So, when a fault is discovered, it is well to look up a virtue to bear it company.

KEEP doing, always doing. Wishing, dreaming, intending, murmuring, talking, sighing, and repining, are idle and profitless employments.

LITERARY GLEANINGS AND GOSSIP.

[This department is not designed to be strictly "critical," and will not supersede our usual book reviews; nor will it be limited to notices of new publications.]

SLASHING CRITICISM.

LITERARY criticism in the United States seems to have arrived at a pass where incisiveness rather than justice is aimed at, and where any amount of unfairness may be pardoned, provided it be sparkling and clever. The "Poems of T. K. Hervey" do not possess much positive merit, and the critic who pronounces a verdict to that effect, discharges his whole duty. There is nothing in the character of the poems, or in the pretensions of the author, that renders the publication of the volume an atrocity, or calls for an elaborate and contemptuous critical essay upon it. The game is not large enough to render a fiercely brilliant wax-candle remuneration. The New York Home Journal, however, makes poor Hervey's collection of verses the theme of a "slasher," of which the following is a specimen:

"There are some people who succeed in winning reputations rather by diplomacy than through any unusual gifts of intellect. Edmund Kirke is one of these: and T. K. Hervey, a collection of whose poems we have before us, is (or was) another of the same ilk. The former writes execrable prose; the latter wrote execrable poetry—if poetry may be called, per courtesy, that which has within it nothing poetic whatsoever. Like Tyrawley, Kirke has been dead (literarily) these two years—having died of literary larceny: and, like Tyrawley, has suffered nobody to know it;—in which last, he has exhibited uncommon tact. Hervey has been dead for some years, also, and everybody has found it out. Had his poems died with him, we should have been spared the disagreeable task of reviewing them, and the still more disagreeable task of reading them preparatory to review. The latter we have done, and hasten to say that we still exist; the former we propose doing, and hasten to say that we feel better, in that we are permitted the opportunity of displaying our philanthropy by warning the public, and readers of poetry especially, that Mr. T. K. Hervey's poems are doggerel sublimated. Not but that a poet may be permitted to write doggerel, if it so pleases him. We have no objection to the writing, if so writing serves as a safety-valve for his stupidity. To the printing it is that we object, in especial, unless the doggerel be printed in illuminated nursery-books, or for parlor circulation; and to the publication we object, emphatically; first, because it is a useless waste of blue-and gold by way of setting; and, secondly, because doggerel ought not to be published at all—except in London or Pekiu.

"There are some people, however, who will perpetrate doggerel—who, having the mens divinior within them, must exhibit its vagaries after their own peculiar fashion. Mr. Hervey is one of these, like Billy Nubbs or Mr. Thingumbob, painfully overburdened with intellect (or want of it), which he has filtered in shallow syllabub through four hundred pages, duodecimo, in desperate endeavors to elevate into poesy that which is essentially prosaic. There is none of the vates about Hervey. If, as his prefacist remarks, 'his poctry is intelligible,' it is not for that reason necessarily meritorious. Intelligibility in writing is a prosaic virtue. In poetry there should always be a vague and unapprehended element; for it is exactly the vague and unapprehended which is the principle of the most ethereal sublimity. There can be no sublimity in that which is prosaically and logically distinct; and hence there is no sublimity—no luxury of passion in the verses of Mr. T. K. Hervey."

After proceeding for a while in this strain, the critic commences hunting "small deer" in the following fashion:

"Of mixed metaphor, Mr. Hervey's compositions are a perfect museum. For instance, at page 46, the poet sings—

'O, for the wings we used to wear,
When the heart was like a bird'—

taking it for granted that if a man has a heart like a bird, he must necessarily have wings like a bird also. Again, in the same stanza, the poet continues the metaphor:

'And floated still, through summer air,
And painted all it looked on fair,
And sung to all it heard.'

In which the bird, first, floats, secondly, paints, and, thirdly, sings to all it hears; which is in exceedingly clumsy taste on the part of the bird—a bird never having been known so paint at all. Moreover, sang is the proper form of the word, the verb sing being in the past tense. Again, at page 46, the poet indulges in bombast like the following:

'I wander about like a shadow of pain,
With a worm in my breast and a spell on my brain;'

in which he first supposes himself to be a 'shadow of pain'—a phrase which means nothing whatsoever; and next insists that he (the shadow of pain) has a worm in his breast (for which of course he should consult a physician) and a spell on his brain—just as if a shadow of pain (or T. K. Hervey) might be supposed to have brains at all.

"At page 174, Mr. Hervey thus utters his invocation:

'I see the honey on her lip—
Have pity, saint, on me,
And turn a lonely gentleman
Into a humble-bee'—

a doggerelism and a platitude which we have never seen exceeded, except among the shambling rhymes of a certain Mr. Whitman. Fancy a lady's lips bedaubed with honey, either literal or metaphorical, and fancy a humble-bee sipping it—that humble-bee being a metamorphosed gentleman. The metaphor is not only absurd, but loathsome and offensive—a shallow conceit exactly in keeping with the gum-Arabic imagination of a baby.

"Again, at page 174, we have a second equally dunderheaded platitude:

'Said I, the fair Anrelia keeps
Her spirit locked from me,
O, show my weary heart the hook
On which she hangs the key.'

"To hang the key of a lady's spirit on a hook is, of course, a safe way of keeping the key from being mislaid; but for a poet to steal the key, and run off with it, and unlock the lady's spirit—really it is the worst sort of burglary. Nobody but Mr. Hervey would be guilty of so mean and ungentlemanly an act.

"Only to be paralleled by the above in absolute absurdity is this which follows:

'Her breast is like a frozen lake,
On whose cold brink I stand;
O, buckle on my spirit's skates,
And take me by the hand!
And lead thou, loving saint, the way
To where the ice is thin,
That it may break beneath my feet
And let a lover in.'

"In which the lady's breast is first supposed to be a frozen lake, on whose cold brink he stands. Then, he buckles on his skates and skates along the lake (breast) to where the ice is thin, and, lastly, tumbles incontinently into the first break, by which is meant Aurelia's mouth. And by all this manœuvering the poet is supposed to have been swallowed by the lady—to have gotten within the frozen lake of her breast, a situation which must be vastly uncomfortable, both for the lady and the poet. Gossamers, dipped in milk, form no parallel; and how the poet is to get out, having gotten in, transcends our comprehension."

Now, it it be true, as the critic tells us further down, that Mr. Hervey's poems are "metaphor run mad, and silliness sublimated," why not dismiss the volume in half a dozen words? His pretensions have not been lofty, and he has no school of admiring dupes whose eyes require to be opened. Had such a book appeared under a great name, or been heralded by an ostentatious flourish of trumpets, or elicited enthusiastic admiration in any quarter, the case would have been different.

CHRISTIAN CRITICISM.

As a specimen of quite a different style of criticism from the foregoing, take the following, referring to the same book, from the New York Weekly Review:

"In the last years of his life, Hervey was a contributor to the Art Journal. He wrote boldly and vigorously, both as a literary and an art critic, while his poems display a strong and true and tender nature, which must have impressed all who came in contact with him as genuine and manly. He was not a great poet. One may read his poems, without at any time being deeply moved and elevated in spirit. His imagination had not that soaring and electrical power which uplifts the reader and quite sweeps him away in sympathy. His faculties as an artist, likewise, lacked thorough cultivation. He wrote from the heart, however, and in feeling and sentiment his poems are often exceedingly felicitous. Many pages are commonplace; but here and there occurs a ray of true poetry, or a burst of noble eloquence, that well repays the reader's patience. Many of the poems are songs, of a very pleasing character, tender in sentiment and melodious in versification. Altogether, the collection is a worthy memorial to a gifted man, and a valuable addition to the poetic literature of England."

This is not so piquant and lively as the slashing style of the Home Journal. All that it has to recommend it is, that it is just, gentlemanly, and humane. But then it must be confessed that it is also somewhat tame. After so much "criticism," possibly the reader may feel some curiosity to judge of Mr. Hervey's merits for himself:

THE DEAD TRUMPETER.

Wake, soldier! wake!—thy war-horse waits,
To bear thee to the battle back;
Thou slumberest at a foeman's gates;
Thy dog would break thy bivouac;
Thy plume is trailing in the dust,
And thy red falchion gathering rust!

Sleep, soldier! sleep!—thy warfare o'er,
Not thine own bugle's loudest strain
Shall ever break thy slumbers more,
With summons to the battle plain;
A trumpet note more loud and deep
Must rouse thee from that leaden sleep!

Thou needst not helm nor cuirass now—
Beyond the Grecian hero's boast—
Thou wilt not quail thy naked brow,
Nor shrink before a myriad host;
For head and heel alike are sound,
A thousand arrows cannot wound!

Thy mother is not in thy dreams,
With that wild widowed look she wore
The day—how long to her it seems!—
She kissed thee at the cottage door,
And sickened at the sounds of joy
That bore away her only boy!

Sleep, soldier!—let thy mother wait
To hear thy bugle on the blast;
Thy dog, perhaps may find the gate,
And bid her come to thee at last;
He cannot tell a sadder tale
Than did thy clarion on the gale,
When last—and far away—she heard its lingering echoes fail.

The above first appeared in a Dublin periodical, in 1832.

We have just taken a fresh "dip" into Alice Cary's new book of poems, from which we made several extracts last week. To them, however, we must add the following, which represents the author in a somewhat different phase from that indicated by our previous quotations:

MY CREED.

I hold that Christian grace abounds
Where charity is seen; that when
We climb to Heaven, 'tis on the rounds
Of love to men.

I hold all else, named piety,
A selfish scheme, a vain pretense;
Where center is not—can there be Circumference?

This I moreover hold, and dare
Affirm where'er my rhyme may go,
Whatever things be sweet or fair,
Love makes them so.

Whether it be the lullabies
That charm to rest the nursling bird,
Or that sweet confidence of sighs
And blushes, made without a word.

Whether the dazzling and the flush
Of softly sumptuous garden bowers,
Or by some cabin door, or bush
Of ragged flowers.

'Tis not the wide phylactery,
Nor stubborn fast, nor stated prayers,
That make us saints; we judge the tree
By what it bears.

And when a man can live apart
From works, on theologic trust,
I know the blood about his heart
Is dry as dust."

GOSSIP FOR THE LADIES.

IT has been decided that there shall be two distinct costumes adopted for this winter. The street dress, short, with small crinoline. With this in the depths of winter will be worn trousers, made with elastic around the ankle, a la Turque. They are to be made of taffeta, the same shade as the short under-petticoat. For evening, or house wear, a long train crinoline, spreading out like a peacock's tail. Over this will be worn very long and elaborately trimmed trains. Bodies and waistbands, in preference to the Princess form, which is all body and skirt in one.

The newest materials are poplins, with silk flower stripes or plain satinets, called in Paris satin la reine, and our grand train robes are to be made of corded silk, with alternate wide velvet stripes, manufactured at Lyons, in the same material. The stripes will be of a different shade to the ground; thus, a dark green stripe will figure on light emerald green: a deep salmon velvet stripe on light salmon color. These are called sunsets.

One dress is described which was to be sent to the Tuilleries, as being of black corded silk, over which curl and spread black velvet ostrich feathers.

One robe was composed of a silver-gray skirt, over which a low tight body and tunic, cut in one, was made of ribbed violet velvet. Another lady wore something still richer in color; she had on a white taffeta underskirt, over which a gold shaded peplum tunic, trimmed with white chenille fringe, variegated with gold, and the side points of the peplum ended with balls and tassels of the same trimming. The body was low and made of the gold-colored silk, but the short sleeves were white fringed lappets ending in points and tasseled.

A young girl was in a cloud of white muslin looped up over very long pink underskirt; her corslet bodice was pink over a high white lace chemisette and sleeves.

The prettiest peplum jackets are either hollowed below the waistband, and fall in long flowing points, or set tight to the waist, and have the points down the back. These points all end in rich tassels, and are worked or trimmed ad libitum.

The paletot-sacks are very short, and will be trimmed with wide lace, so that very little of the jacket will be discernible, but others will be covered with jet, cord, and embroidery.

The long, wide peplum sleeves, or velvet cloaks, will also be adopted on negligé robes, which are to be made of red, blue, white, or lavender cashmere. All have streamer scarfs behind, ending in rich fringe or tassels.

There has been something invented to take the place of the old-fashioned "stay;" it is called a stays-baud, and is already adopted by our élégantes.

It is very suitable to our present style of dress—it is low and elastic and fits the figure like a glove. It is healthy, which is more than merely pretty, leaving every part of the body, with the exception of the waist, entirely free. It is indispensable to stout ladies, and adds a certain roundness to the less favored. In this band lies the secret of Parisian grace, Parisian fit, Parisian etcetcras.

Humming birds, with gold beaks and jeweled eyes, are worn as brooches, clasps, and agraffes by the leaders of ton.

It is declared that nets shall be no longer worn. New styles of pins and bandeaux may be looked for.

We have a few novelties in the accessory line: neckties with worked brecch-loaders, paletot-sacks in white cloth, belts with painted profiles on squares of gros de Naples, little white bolero vests embroidered over with black jet, and made without sleeves, to put on under paletots which are not yet worn. The catalane bonnet is square behind and round in front. The full-blown tea-rose is the favorite flower on ruby-colored velvet Watteau hats. Mother-of-pearl ornaments and trimmings are used in profusion. Boots are even more costly; in fact, feet are now set in boot mountings as if they were jewels. Every material is worn on the promenades—some dress for the sun, some for the rain, some for both sun and rain. Three narrow plissés round under-petticoats are preferred to a deep one.

SPIRADELLA.

A CHEERFUL spirit makes labor light and sleep sweet, and all around happy, which is much better than being only rich.

SAVANNAH is outstripping Charleston as a seaport city.

[For the Californian.]

ALLEGORY OF THE CONVOLVULUS.

ITS colors: let us read them right—
Purple, of Majesty the sign,
As is of Purity, the white.
I need not to thy mind divioe
What means the meek-eyed tender blue;
It speaketh for itself—the True.
So in this vase-like flower we fiud
Symboled these charms of woman's face:
Virtue and dignity, combiued
With innocence and love and grace.

Symbol too, these fragile leaves,
The shortness of the life of man;
Its own a single hour bereaves,
And his scarce stretches to a span.
Gently its tender petals close,
Then meek and still it bends its head.
May we as fitly meet the throes
That number us among the dead.

Again: as passed the dews of night,
This flower but spreads at morning's light.
May not we mortals humbly hope,
That, passing through this vale of tears,
Our eyes in trust and faith may ope
To glories of the upper spheres?

Another lesson still would'st learn,
O, dear one! from this fragile urn?
Rise at the light; yea, quit the couch,
When open its ethereal eyes;
And with thy living vision vouch
The Morning Glories of the Skies:
The Moon, and each expectant Star,
Grown bright and brighter, to adorn,
As heralds dawning East afar,
The coming of refulgent Morn.

Another sermon still would'st hear?
Is not there, then, a little voice—
Bend closer thine attentive ear—
That bids us in our hearts rejoice
That ever in the upper air
Are brighter glories we may share?
Glories of both Morn and Eve;
Immortal, do we but believe.

Love! Nor yet is half the story
Of that house-side Morning Glory.
Away deep in its mystic cell,
Reflected from the vault on high,
Shadowed I see a little hand;
And as I look my eyelids swell.
It beckons to us as a wand,
It beckons to us from the sky.

WM. CAREY JONES.

THE STORY OF A SCRIPTURAL PANORAMIST.

BY MARK TWAIN.

[This story is going the rounds of the Eastern press wrongly credited to the Alta California. It was written more than a year ago, at the time the steamer "Capital" was launched, for THE CALIFORNIAN. "Mark" starts on a steamer to report the launch for us, when he meets a number of prospecting friends, who, having discovered a bar on the lower deck, invite him down to sample its contents. At the bar a number of interesting "bar stories" are told, when a Mr. Nickerson is reminded of an incident that occurred during his temporary sojourn in Connecticut some months previous, which he proceeds to relate. In the meanwhile the launch takes place, and "Mark" sees nothing of it, but he reports the story.]

THERE was a fellow traveling in that country (said Mr. Nickerson) with a moral-religious show—a sort of Scriptural panorama—and he hired a wooden-headed old slab to play the piano for him. After the first night of his performance the showman said:

"My friend, you seem to know pretty much all the tunes there are, and you worry along first-rate. But then, didn't you notice that sometimes last night, the piece you happened to be playing was a little rough on the proprieties, so to speak—didn't seem to jibe with the general gait of the picture that was passing at the time, as it were—was a little foreign to the subject, you know—as if you didn't neither follow suit nor trump, you understand?"

"Well, no," the fellow said. He hadn't noticed, but it might be; he had played along just as it came to hand.

So they put it up so that the simple old dummy was to keep his eyes on the panorama after that, and as soon as a stunning picture rolled out, he was to fit it to a dot with a piece of music that would help the audience to get an idea of the subject, and warm them up like a camp-meeting revival. That sort of thing would corral their sympathies, the showman said.

There was a big audience that night—mostly middle-aged and old people, who belonged to the church and took a strong interest in Bible matters, and the balance were young bucks and heifers—they always come out strong on panoramas, you know, because it gives them a chance to kiss one another's mugs in the dark.

Well, the showman began to swell himself up for this lecture, and the old mud-dobber tackled the piano, and run his fingers up and down once or twice to see that she was all right, and then the fellows behind the curtain commenced to grind out the panorama. The showman balanced his weight on his right foot, propped his hands on his hips, flung his eyes over the scenery, and said:

"Ladies and gentlemen, the painting now before you illustrates the beautiful and touching parable of the Prodigal Son. Observe the happy expression breaking over the features of the poor suffering youth—so worn and weary with his long march; note also the ecstacy beaming from the uplifted countenance of the aged father, and the joy that sparkles in the eyes of the excited group of youths and maidens, and seems ready to burst in a welcoming chorus from their lips. The lesson, my friends, is as solemn and instructive as the story is tender and beautiful."

The mud-dobber was ready, and the second the speech was finished, he struck up:

"O, we'll all get blind drunk,
When Johnny comes marching home!"

Some of the people giggled, and some groaned a little. The showman could not say a word. He looked at the piano man sharp, but he was all lovely and serene—he didn't know there was anything out of gear.

The panorama moved on, and the showman drummed up his grit, and started in afresh:

"Ladies and gentlemen, the fine picture now unfolding itself to your gaze, exhibits one of the most notable events in Bible history—our Savior and his disciples upon the sea of Galilee. How grand, how awe-inspiring are the reflections which the subject invokes! What sublimity of faith is revealed to us in this lesson from the sacred writings! The Savior rebukes the angry waves, and walks securely upon the bosom of the deep!"

All around the house they were whispering. "O, how lovely, how beautiful!" and the orchestra let himself out again:

"O, a life on the ocean wave,
And a home on the rolling deep!"

There was a good deal of honest snickering turned on this time, and considerable groaning, and one or two old deacons got up and went out. The showman gritted his teeth, and cursed the piano man to himself, but the fellow sat there like a knot on a log, and seemed to think he was doing first-rate.

After things got quiet, the showman thought he would make one more stagger at it anyhow, though his confidence was mighty shaky. The supes started the panorama to grinding again, and he says:

"Ladies and gentleman, this exquisite painting illustrates the raising of Lazarus from the dead by our Savior. Observe the half confused, half inquiring look upon the countenance of the awakening Lazarus. Observe also the attitude and expression of the Savior, who takes him gently by the sleeves of his shroud by one hand, while he points with the other toward the distant city."

Before anybody could get off an opinion in the case, the innocent old ass at the piano struck up:

"Come, rise up, William R-i-l-e-y,
And come along with me!"

All the solemn old floats got up in a huff to go, and everybody else laughed till the windows rattled.

The showman went down and grabbed the orchestra, and shook him up, and said:

"That lets you out, you know, you chowder-headed old clam! Go to the doorkeeper and get your money, and cut stick!"

SCHAMYL, THE CIRCASSIAN.

AFTER his capture in 1859, Schamyl, the celebrated Circassian chief, was sent with his family to Kalouga. He seems to have expected nothing but harsh treatment from his conquerors, but the Russian policy was otherwise, and he has from time to time, it appears, been loaded with Imperial favors. A spacious house is at his disposal, and an income more than sufficient for his wants. On the occasion of the death of his favorite daughter, a courier was sent to Schamyl in the Caucasus with the body of the deceased. This seems to have touched the venerable chief, who at once addressed an autograph letter to the Czar, which is given at length in the Russian papers. Schamyl here declares himself to be no less vanquished by the Emperor's kindness than by his arms, and begs that he and his children may be allowed to take the oath of fidelity. "I am ready," he says, "to pronounce it before the entire people. I invoke, as the witness of my loyalty and of the purity of my thoughts, Almighty God and Mahomet his prophet. I will take the oath before the body, scarcely chilled, of my beloved daughter Naphisato, and upon the holy Koran. The Czar at once acceded to the request, and accordingly, on the 7th instant, Schamyl and his sons took the oath of fidelity to the Emperor and to the Grand Duke at Kalouga. After the ceremony the representative of the nobles of the province addressed the exile in the name of the Russian Government: "Live in peace, valiant veteran," he said, "in this city, where your noble character is honored, and where your calm and modest life is a theme of constant praise. May you long continue this irreproachable life, glorifying the high magnanimity of your protector, our beloved sovereign, Alexander the Second." The reply of Schamyl, as given in the Russian papers, is full of protestations of loyalty, and reads as though it had been very freely translated from the original Arabic by a Russian official.

AMUSEMENTS.

AT Maguire's Opera House Rocambole was played on Monday evening last for the benefit of Stage Manager Graves—for the first and the last time. The attendance was good—if the play was not. Rocambole proved to be a poorly written translation of the original French play, with characters illy adapted to the personnel of the Opera House Company. Miss Kingsbury played the uncongenial character of "Barcarat," a declamatory tragic part, badly; and McCullough that of a polished French villain, indifferently. But the piece is dead, and we do not propose to further administrate upon its poor effects. Fanchon and Pauvrette—on the succeeding evenings—with their attractive merits and almost perfect rendition, fully atoned for the shortcomings of Rocambole. Pauvrette is very strongly cast, and very handsomely placed on the stage. As represented at the Opera House, it possesses all the elements of popularity, and we would not be surprised if it should prove another Cricket in that respect.

This afternoon, Fanchon. This evening a new play entitled The Winter Robin will be produced. Monday evening is set aside for the benefit of Mr. McCullough, who will essay "Hamlet" for that occasion—Miss Kingsbury volunteering, and playing the "gentle Ophelia," and Kate Denin, John Wilson, and Robert Fulford volunteering; all of which must tend to bring a crowded house.

The programme for the coming week can be found in the advertisement on the last page.

M. AND M'ME JOSEPH HEINE.—These artists, who lately arrived here from Australia, will give their first concert on Monday evening, at Platt's Hall, with the aid of Siguor and Signora Bianchi, Misses Emma and Celia Howson, Mr. Crowly and Mr. Evans. M. Heine, though born blind, has acquired a wonderful mastery over the violin, while M'me Heine is a brilliant but thorough and artistic performer on the piano. Judging from two or three selections given by them at an informal soiree, a few days ago, their entertainments will be full of interest to the musical public.

METROPOLITAN.—The Howson family close their season with this evening's performance, set aside for their benefit. Some time during the coming week the Ravel-Martinetti troupe, with the "Green Monster." The stage and scenery are being prepared, and the ballet troupe are drilling for the event.

THE SAN FRANCISCO AMATEURS' entertainment and social at Turn-Verein Hall, on Thursday evening last, was fully attended, and was a most pleasant festival. "Othello" was performed very creditably, though it was almost too heavy a piece for amatuers to be effective in. Mr. Fulford as "Othello," and Miss Caroline as "Emelia," played their parts well The young lady has a good voice and reads with spirit and feeling.

PACIFIC LODGE I. O. B. B.—Will give an entertainment, dramatic and musical, at Platt's Hall, on Wednesday evening next, the proceeds to be appropriated to benevolent purposes. "Black-eyed Susan" will be performed by amatuers, after which musical selections by the Misses Lamlein, the whole to conclude with a ball. We hope the Hall will be crowded on this occasion.

BENEFITS.—Numerous benefits have come off during the week—too numerous, in fact, for us to mention them with a paper only the size of the CALIFORNIAN at our disposal, so we will not attempt it.

WHICH of the apostles was the best cricket player? Paul, who "stood up before the eleven, and was bold."

IN Spain, the sale of newspapers is prohibited in the public streets.

DR. BOURNE'S MEDICINE CHEST—No 6.

"MEDICINE CHESTS always contain bitter pills and nauseous draughts; intended however, for the benefit of those who take their contents."

FOOTE has left his verdict against medical mysteries, in his whimsical definition of a physician, whom he describes as "a grave, formal animal, who picks our pockets by talking unintelligible stuff in a sick man's chamber, till nature cures or medicine kills him." Howbeit, blessing and honor, say we, be upon the head of the true physician, of whatever creed, for his is ever a work of mercy and love. As Lamb says: "There is healing in the very creak of his shoes, as he comes up the stair." There be those, however, in every community, who, in circulating their quack nostrums, care little whether they make the well sick, or the sick sicker.

THE distinguished Dr. James Johnson says: "I declare it to be my most conscientious opinion, that if there were not a single physician, surgeon, or apothecary, or a man midwife, or chemist, or druggist, or drug in the world, there would be less mortality among mankind than there is now."

CURES GUARANTEED without medicines; very pleasant method, quick, satisfactory in all respects, by DR. BOURNE, No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

"DR. BOURNE'S BATHS."—The sick always know where to find this old and popular institution. Removed only twice in nearly twelve years. No. 10 Masonic Temple, Post street.

MUSIC AND PIANO PLAYING.

MUSIC.

A CURIOUS calculation it would be to determine how many persons play "a little" on the piano. In every country village perhaps one family in eight or ten owns a piano or some reed instrument; music is as diffused as newspapers are, and yet, largely owing to our youth as a people, partially also to our precipitate haste, we have treated music as we have books, inventions, sciences and art—swallowed it in great gulps without much discrimination. It is popular in one sense, and yet not in the truest; it has not been popularized, nor has its power as a means of culture been suitably estimated.

Music is more feminine than all the nine Muses rolled into one. If adopted as a profession she wants all your soul and time, or wants none of you. The way to her is sheer repetition, and the chances are that you will wonder, in disgust, whether it is worth going through so much to get so little. Her "scales" are dryer and thinner than those of a fish, and more inexorable than those ought to be that the figure of Justice holds. They are finger-gymnastics, which alone can subdue the fingers into a mechanical condition. You may hate them, but you must "take" them, and cleave to them. More or less they run through every composition; their fingering is of constant application; in vain is it to learn "Money Musk," "Fisher's Hornpipe," "Java March," and "Bonapurte's Retreat from Moscow," for without months and months of scales, the fingers will never acquire suppleness or independence. And when this skill of the fingers is attained, only in the rarest cases does money drop freely from them; most musicians will testify, on the contrary, that it oozes like blood from their finger-ends. As an organist (if you are one of the elect few), you will get, by general rule, perhaps half what is paid for the care of the church edifice; as a composer—for you must not be dazzled by the success of Mr. Charles Grobe's last variation (Opus 9,019)—the publisher will issue your compositions for you, or will allow you to purchase copies at the actual cost price; as a teacher, you shall dance attendance for pupils and the payment of your bills, and shall grieve at heart to see music degrading herself in your unhappy person. Music is a profession of wrangles and jars, and the Passions that nowadays throng around her are of the violent order; for you must take fair note that the times are not as they were

> "When music, heavenly maid! was young,
> While yet in ancient Greece she sung."

THE DISSECTION OF MUSIC.

The very good people who join in the singing of that venerated but wretched piece of psalmody, "St. Martin's," do not know that they are bringing waltzes into church, nor do they suspect that about one-half of church music are waltzes, saved from being irreverent by being sung slowly, but as trifling—many of them—as the drinking song in "Traviata" if only they should move off allegro. A march movement proceeds evenly, like the swing of a pendulum; while the waltz goes by beats in groups of three, which peculiarity is possibly at the bottom of its sometime pathetic, sometime joy-moving, power. The "Marseillaise" and "Yankee Doodle" would not stir feet and thrill hearts if transmuted into waltz movements; and "God save the King" would appear badly as a march. This chief distinction, running through the whole range of existing or possible compositions, makes rhythm simply to consist of accent, which is the pepper and salt of all playing, without which it is a mere succession of simple beats, meaning nothing. Objectively, music is a matter of sheer mathematics; time is nothing more than marking the intervals of time as it pass—just what the metronome accurately does—but it can do nothing adequately toward directing rhythm.

RHYTHM, MOVEMENT, AND EXPRESSION.

But there are mightier aspects behind. Music contains three characteristics, increasing in subtlety in the order named, like the three degrees of comparison, viz: rhythm, movement, expression. The first is obvious, merely mathematical, lying entirely within the range of our eyes; the second lies partly within and partly without that range, partly spiritual and partly substantial; the last is utterly intangible, and is what separates the playing of Beethoven from that of an automaton. Movement can never be disclosed without rhythm; but rhythm may be perfect without necessarily presenting the movement of the composition, yet the importance of rhythm is mainly that its absence effectually destroys the subjective character of the piece. For every composition not wholly meaningless contains an essential characteristic of individuality, not always easily determined and almost never accurately understood. It is the anakuklosis, or self-revolving of the piece; it is the key, the thread, the order of thought in it. To find what that is, we must follow it beyond the range of our eyes to the line where movement and expression coalesce; but that such a characteristic does exist admits of the clearest proof. For, compare the "Marseillaise" with "Yankee Doodle" and "Dandy Jim of Caroline." I grant that the metronomic sign is not the same in the three, but make it so; let them move together as marches (which they are), and it appears that there is some distinction which andante and allegro fail to cover. Or take the firm opening chords of the overture to "Nabuco," or the equally noble beginning of "Stradella," or the duo in "Martha"—more full of pathos, more really moving in its appeal, than anything else I know in musical composition—Solo, profugo, rejetto, Di mia vita sul mattin; or a hundred other passages that might be named, of which it is impossible to say that melody, fastness or slowness, and rhythm, all combined, account for their differences, and you may believe in the "self-revolving" of a composition, its law and expression to itself.

Experience, however, is more subtle. It is more subtle than the odor of flowers, for that we can define, though we cannot see it or touch it. We can only point in the direction where this is. The mystery alone is absolute, for it is the mystery of absolute fact. It is a conventional fact that two and two equal four, but the wonderful difference—appreciable by the dullest ear—between the major third and the minor, is an absolute fact which will never be explained in this world, and until it is explained we shall not know the larger facts that underlie musical expression. But it is just this that determines the master, and made Beethoven's performance of his "Vesper Hymn" better than my own; just this that holds the thought in music, and is in it the charm to soothe the savage breast. It is indefinable, for there are no words for it; intangible, for it is purely subjective; invisible, for it is wholly out of the plane of our sight.

"LEARNING" MUSIC.

I used an incorrect expression, further back, but purposely, as it is a popular one. It is impossible to "learn" music, and no man can impart it. Guido could not make a Guido of you. A teacher may produce mechanical skill and correctness—may impart a knowledge of rhythm and an appreciation of movement; but his power stops there: the pilot leaves as the misty seas are reached. All these are materials, useless without the skill to build; they no more make music than paint makes a picture. Here the test comes in, whether you did well in refusing to listen to those who warned you, by the example of their own experience at least, to be not seduced by music. For, with unpardonable stupidity, it is assumed that music is a necessary accomplishment, and we proceed to don it as we don a coat, ignorant or unmindful that if it is not already in the soul it cannot be put there; the road is outward from soul to finger-ends, not inward. And this setting one child to learn music, another drawing, another painting, another the working of impossible animals in Berlin wool, is just a little sillier than the time honored Old World custom of allotting professions and future husbands and wives to unbaptized babies in the cradle.

GOTTSCHALK'S MUSIC.

The player's style, if distinctive at all, should be his own. Very few teachers are enough removed from the inevitable characteristics of a hack to make it safe to follow them; and if great players are taken as models, by a humiliating law of our human imperfection, their absurdities are sooner caught than their excellencies. Least of all, any imitation of that popular musical eccentric, Gottschalk, should be allowed; for it is only just to say that he is the most fatal guide that could be, and that his influence on young players, both by his performances and his compositions, is exceedingly pernicious. Overlook his white kids and his airs, and his playing, in some chief points, is unlike anything else ever known; but we cannot prudently expect to light our fires with Catherine-wheels and tourbillon spirals. It is not injustice to say that it would be better for everybody but himself and his publishers if his compositions—unless something like the "Berceuse," the "Dying Poet," and the "Marche de Nuit" be excepted—had never been written out. Hundreds will indignantly spring to his defense; but consider. The "Last Hope," absurdly called a religious meditation, opens with a beautiful passage of harmony; but the air, though pretty, is smothered in a mass of froth. "Murmures Eoliennes" none but the best pianists can master; "Union" is merely a piece of musical slight-of-hand; and, in short, this deur, marvelous "Seven Octaves" is altogether too much upon the seventh octave to be anything but a musical Puck:

> "I'll follow you, I'll lead you about, around,
> Through bog, through bush, through brake, through brier."

PIANO MUSIC.

Many people seem to forget that a piano is but a piano, and try to make something more of it; and a great deal of excellent music—as well as such absurdities as the "Battle of Prague"—has been wasted in trying to adapt it to the piano. Church music goes passably well upon it, but anything which calls for prolonged tone is impossible upon the piano. This cuts off the whole range of organ music, and anybody who doubts may make a test of the brilliant organ extravaganza, Wely's Offertoire in G. Louis's "Departed Days"—a very sweet nocturne upon brass or stringed instruments, and very popular years ago—is ridiculous tum-tum on the piano, because there is no way of producing the prolonged tones. And much more mistaken is it to adapt overtures to the piano, for it is simply to emasculate them of all beauty and leave but the skeleton framework; once hear the overture to "Tell," "Stradella," "Nabuco," "Fra Diavolo," and many another, adequately given by an orchestra, and one never wishes to hear or play an overture on the piano afterward. For this is really one of the most imperfect of known instruments, having little substance of tone, and having also a "wolf" of discord in each octave. The violin, which is the most perfect instrument, is surpassed by it only in compass. The organ is great only by the number of pipes controlled by a single manual; but the completest triumph of instrumentation is of course the well appointed orchestra. It was one of Thalberg's charms that he comprehended, and yielded to, the deficiencies of his instrument, and played in such a "gentlemanly" way. He had no claptrap airs; he did not seek applause by making the piano roar, or sing, or imitate the cries of animals, but simply played it, as well as it can ever be played, with the quietness that marks an artist.

STYLE, TOUCH, EMOTION.

A good style of playing, as of writing, is hard to define by rules; yet we can put up the sign "cave!" near certain things. Look out for that lion in the way, Force. Almost any Bottom can roar extempore, and any blacksmith can pound; but the piano is a harp, not a horseshoe, and the power to express, with the fingers, its possible capacities of light and shade is equally different and inestimable. Notice that the name of the instrument, curiously and suggestively enough, is a compound of two musical terms—piano and forte—and the name in English is the soft-loud. Let it be just what its name imports. Its value is chiefly in melody, in which point I count it safe to say that no other instrument equals it; it is not loud, nor is it a many voiced orchestra, nor has it the roll of an organ, and any attempt to make it do the work of these, sacrifices its delicacy and brilliancy without replacing them by anything else.

The beginning, middle and end of a good style is, of course, Touch. This is like saying that the first thing in oratory is to be an orator, yet the force of language can no further go. The question of possessing touch is the one that decides whether pearls, or pebbles and dirt, shall drop from the finger-ends. Crescendo is everlastingly insisted upon by some people who make a hobby of it, impatient at the very name of diminuendo; but they forget that no power we are acquainted with has ever been able to make hills without valleys intervening. Can you strike one key, say ten or twenty times, with a gradually increasing force, and then as gradually diminish during an equal number? If you can do this well or approximately, if you have firmness and precision and do not now and then raise the hammer without sounding the string, rest assured your figers are trained and susceptible of training; but if you fail entirely in these, your fingers—however mechanically correct—are as much out of place upon the keyboard as the paw of a gorilla.

Above all, do not feel like apologizing for your emotions, or for your love of music, if you have such a love. If it is true that what is bred in the bone will come out in the flesh, it is equally true that what is not bred there will not come out; and, consequently, the many people who smile serenely or openly deride, when some others "go into raptures" over music, simply disown what they never had—ears to understand. For music is a subjective matter; a donkey hears all the tones as well as a man does, and the difference of appreciation between donkey and man, as between man and man, is in the inner ear, the possession or the want of a certain temper of soul. Having ears, some hear not, and mistakenly pity those who do, whereas the pity is for themselves. I was not ashamed that my eyes filled when I first heard the Boston organ, for man is an emotional animal, and laughter and tears alike require no other justification than a sufficient moving cause thereto.

THE ATTRIBUTES OF MUSIC.

The follower of each science is ready to maintain with his honor that there is none other like it; and this is only because he has gotten further into it than others have. For all sciences, arts, or sorts of human knowledge, let us remember, are but so many paths of which we see and enter only the hither end; all beyond is out of sight and to be hereafter revealed. And of music we certainly know that it is the most subtle pleasure and power we have—no more to be detained and examined than time; no more to be handled than electricity. Of all our satisfactions, it is the very least gross; they who know it want no defense of it, while they who do not know it admit nothing to be defended. We have extant a defense of poesy, but the man were mad who should put forth a defense of music. Like beauty, it is its own excuse for being. I do not hesitate to pronounce music heavenly, for it is a remnant of the heaven mankind lost; define it or not, it does reach further, draw more strongly, link more closely, to the original purity than anything else the fall left us. Its harmony reminds us, in all-human discords, that there is somewhere eternal calm and order; its melody is proof enough that there is a pure and ineffable God. Whether the stars are actually "forever singing as they shine" is of no importance. The best work of music is in quiet homes where the object sought in it is pleasure rather than pretense. Do not hold up a farthing candle to show it to anybody who cannot see it, my dear young pianist; and never apologize to your own soul for loving it. For it is a light on many dark ways of circumstance, against which we were besotted and blameworthy to close our eyes; and the possession of its faculty is a matter for constant joy, and never for even momentary shame.—Julius Wilcox, in the New York "Galaxy."

THE CUNNING OF THE WILD TURKEY.

[The following admirable sketch of the characteristic caution of the wild turkey of the Mississippi valley was written years ago by Thomas B. Thorpe, better known to the readers of that best of sporting papers, the old New York Spirit of the Times—"Porter's" Spirit of the Times—under the nom de plume of "Tom Owen, the Bee-Hunter." The writer is an artist, and pictures forth his subject with all the clearness and fidelity of a Bierstadt.]

WE once knew an Indian, celebrated for all wood craft, who made a comfortable living by supplying a frontier town with game. Often did he greet the villagers with loads of venison, with grouse, with bear, but seldom, indeed, did he offer the wild turkey for sale. Upon being reproached for his seeming incapacity to kill the turkey, by those who desired the bird, he defended himself as follows:

"Me meet moose; he stop to eat, me shoot him. Me meet bear; he climb a tree—no see Indian; me shoot him. Me meet deer; he look up—say may be Indian, may be stump—and me shoot him. Me see turkey great way off; he look up and say, Indian coming, sure; me no shoot turkey; he cunning too much."

* * * * * * * * *

"I rather think," said a turkey-hunter, "if you want to find a thing very cunning, you need not go to the fox or such varmints, but take a gobbler. I once hunted regular after the same one for three years, and never saw him twice.

"I knew the critter's 'yelp' as well as I knew Music's, my old deer dog; and his track was as plain to me as the trail of a log hauled through a dusty road.

"I hunted the gobbler always in the same 'rauge,' and about the same 'scratchins,' and he got so, at last, that when I 'called,' he would run from me, taking the opposite direction to my own foot tracks.

"Now, the old rascal kept a great deal on a ridge, at the end of which, where it lost itself in the swamp, was a hollow cypress tree. Determined to outwit him, I put on my shoes heels foremost, walked leisurely down the ridge, and got into the hollow tree, and gave a 'call,' and boys," said the speaker, exultingly, "it would have done you good to see that turkey coming toward me on a trot, looking at my tracks, and thinking I had gone the other way."

* * * * * * * * *

They seem incapable of being deceived, and taking everything strange, as possessed to them of danger—whether it be moth out of season, or a veteran hunter—they appear to common or uncommon observers annihilated from the country, were it not for their foot-prints occasionally to be seen in the soft soil beside the running stream, or in the light dust in the beaten road.

A veteran gobbler, used to all the tricks of the hunter's art; one who has had his wattles cut with shot; against whose well defended breast had struck the spent ball of the rifle; one who, although almost starved, would walk by the treasures of grain in the "trap" and "pen"; a gobbler who will listen to the plaintive note of the female until he has tried its quavers, its length, its repetitions, by every rule nature has given him; and then perhaps not answer, except in a smothered voice, for fear of being deceived; such a turkey will W—— select to break a lance with, and, in spite of the chances against him, win.

The turkey-hunter, armed with his "call," starts into the forest; he bears upon his shoulder the trusty gun. He is either informed of the presence of turkeys, and has a particular place or bird in view, or he makes his way cautiously along the banks of some running stream; his progress is slow and silent: it may be that he unexpectedly hears a noise, sounding like distant thunder; he then knows that he is in close proximity of the game, and that he has disturbed it to flight. When such is the case, his work is comparatively done.

We will, for illustration, select a more difficult hunt. The day wears toward noon; the patient hunter has met no "sign," when suddenly a slight noise is heard, not unlike, to unpracticed ears, a thousand other wood-land sounds; the hunter listens; again the sound is heard, as if a pebble dropped into the bosom of a little lake. It may be that woodpecker, who, desisting from his labors, has opened his bill to yawn; or, perchance, yonder little bird so industriously scratching among the dead leaves of that young holly. Again, precisely the same sound is heard; yonder, high in the heavens, is a solitary hawk, winging its way over the forests; its rude scream, etherealized, might come down to our ears in just such a sound as made the turkey-hunter listen; again the same note; now more distinct. The quick ear of the hunter is satisfied; stealthily he intrenches himself behind a fallen tree, a few green twigs are placed before him, from among which protrudes the muzzle of his deadly weapon.

Thus prepared, he takes his "call," and gives one solitary "cluck," so exquisitely that it chimes in with the running brook and the rustling leaf.

It may be that a half a mile off, if the place be favorable for conveying sound, is feeding a "gobbler;" prompted by his nature, as he quickly scratches up the herbage that conceals his food, he gives utterance to the sounds that first attracted the hunter's attention.

Poor bird! he is bent on filling his crop; his feelings are listless, common-place; his wings are awry; the plumage on his breast seems soiled with rain; his wattles are contracted and pale—look! he starts!—every feather is instantly in its place; he raises his delicate game looking head full four feet from the ground, and listens; what an eye! what a stride is suggested by that lifted foot! gradually the head sinks; again the bright plumage grows dim, and, with a low cluck, he resumes his search for food.

The treasures of the American forest are before him; the choice pecan-nut is neglected for that immense "grub-worm" that rolls down the decayed stump, too large to crawl; now that grasshopper is nabbed; presently a hill of ants presents itself, and the bird leans over it, and, with wondering curiosity, peers down the tiny hole of its entrance, out of which are issuing the industrious insects.

Again that cluck greets his ear; up rises the head with lightning swiftness; the bird starts forward a pace or two, looks around in wonder, and answers back.

No sound is heard but the falling acorn; and it fairly echoes, as it rattles from limb to limb, and dashes off to the ground.

The bird is uneasy; he picks pettishly, smooths down his feathers, elevates his head slowly, and then brings it to the earth; raises his wings as if for flight, jumps upon the limb of a fallen tree, looks about, settles down finally into a brown study, and evidently commences thinking.

An hour may have elapsed; he has resolved the matter over; his imagination has become inflamed; he has heard just enough to wish to hear more; he is satisfied that no turkey-hunter uttered the sounds that reached his ear, for they were too few and far between; and then there rises up in his mind some disconsolate mistress, and he gallantly flies down from his low perch, gives his body a swaggering motion, and utters a distinct and prolonged cluck, significant of both surprise and joy.

On the instant, the dead twigs near by crack beneath a heavy tread, and he starts off under the impression that he is caught; but the meanderings of some ruminating cow inform him of his mistake. Composing himself, he listens; ten minutes since he challenged, when a low cluck in the distance reaches his ears.

Now, our gobbler is an old bird, and has several times, as if by a miracle, escaped from harm with his life; he has grown very cunning indeed.

He will not roost two successive nights upon the same tree, so that daylight never exposes him to the hunter, who has hidden himself away in the night to kill him in the morning's dawn.

He never gobbles without running a short distance at least, as if alarmed at the noise he makes himself; he presumes everything is suspicious and dangerous, and his experience has heightened the instinct.

Twice, when young, was he coaxed within gun shot, but got clear by some fault of the percussion-caps; after that, he was fooled by an idle school-boy, who was a kind of ventriloquist, and would have been slain had not the urchin over-loaded his gun.

Three times did he come near being killed by heedlessly wandering with his thoughtless play-fellows.

Once he was caught in a "pen," and got out by an overlooked hole in its top.

Three feathers of last year's "fan," decayed under the weight of a spring trap.

All this experience has made him a "deep" bird; and he will sit and plume himself, when common hunters are tooting away, but never so wisely as to deceive him twice. They all reveal themselves by over-stepping the modesty of nature, and woo him too much; his loves are far more coy, far less intrusive.

Poor bird! he does not know that W—— is spreading his snare for him, and is even then so sure of his victim as to be revolving in his mind whether his goodly carcass should be a present to a newly-married friend, or be served up, in savory fumes, from his own bachelor but hospitable board.

* * * * * * *

It was the fate of that unlucky gobbler to follow hundreds of his predecessors.

CHEERFULNESS.—There are not a few who, even in this life, seem to be preparing themselves for that smileless eternity to which they look forward, by banishing all gayety from their hearts and all joyousness from their countenances. I meet one such in the street, not unfrequently, a person of intelligence and education, but who gives me and all that pass such a chilling look of recognition, something as if he were one of Heaven's assessors, come down to "doom" every acquaintance he met, that I have sometimes begun to sneeze on the spot, and gone home with a violent cold, dating from that instant. I don't doubt he would cut his kitten's tail off, if he caught her playing with it. Please tell me who taught her to play with it?—Holmes.

THE following motto is over the door of a recruiting rendezvous in Boston: "List, list! O, list!—SHAKSPEARE."

AN ESCAPADE OF CATS.

THE thriving town of Richmond, Ill., one day recently, was the scene of a sensation and a catastrophe. The sensation was caused by the advent of Van Amburgh & Co's Mammoth Menagerie. The catastrophe we propose to describe.

On the day in question, an immense crowd had been attracted to see the living giraffe, and the other wonders of the menagerie. The caravan had made its grand procession through the streets; the tent had been erected, and a throng of expectant sight-seers were gathered around the entrance, awaiting the opening of the doors. Just then an odd-looking genius drove up to the lot, seated upon a rackety lumber wagon, carefully boarded over, drawn by a pair of spavined, wind galled, dilapidated steeds, and eagerly inquired for the manager. Upon that person making his appearance he was saluted with—

"Hello, Squire, I've brought you a load of cats!" "A load of what?" exclaimed the astonished manager. "A load of cats to feed your lions on." "To feed our lions on! The deuce you have. We don't feed our lions on cats' meat; they eat nothing but the best of beef." "Shoo! I know better than that. I've read in the papers that cats are the favorite food of lions. Besides, I've got a contract with your agent for a load of 'em, with a revenue stamp onto it, and I guess you can't go back on that." Saying which, the cat merchant produced a greasy slip of paper which read as follows:

"RICHMOND, Oct. 5th, 1866.

"This contract witnesseth that I have this day contracted with Simon Wiggins to furnish a load of cats to feed the lions on, for which you will pay him the hereinafter mentioned prices, to wit: for A. 1, Prime Cats, 75 cts.; for Store Cats, 50 cts. each.

"JONAS BUNG,
"Cat Agent Van Amburgh & Co.'s Menagerie.

"To the Manager."

"My friend," said the manager, after reading this document, "you have been imposed upon. I do not know any such person as Jonas Bung, and I don't want any cats."

"You lie, now you know you do," retorted Wiggins with imperturbable good humor, "you're only trying to beat me down, and get 'em cheap. I've got a prime lot—75 of 'em. Just look at 'em!"—and hastily descending from his perch, he commenced shoving at the tail-board of his wagon, to allow the manager a chance to examine his load. In his nervousness, however, he managed so awkwardly, that the board dropped completely out, and with a terrible sputtering his entire load of cats sprang into the crowd.

A score of worthless curs, that were on the ground, made a dash for the cats, and away they went, helter-skelter, among the throng, upsetting women and children, and creating dire confusion on every side. Towards the town the streets were filled with people proceeding to the menagerie, who, seeing the commotion, and hearing the shouts accompanying it, at once imagined some terrible accident. The next instant a rumor spread through the crowd that the Royal Bengal Tiger was loose, and a scene ensued that beggars description. "Every one for himself, and the d—l take the hindmost" was the motto acted on, and a general stampede followed, in which an astonishing display of agility was made. People ran into houses and bolted their doors; ladies in tilting hoops performed extraordinary exploits in the way of climbing fences, and what with sputtering cats, yelping dogs, screaming women, and howling children, it really seemed for a while as if Bedlam had broken loose and taken possession of the streets of Richmond.

In a short time the truth of the matter became known, and the excitement quieted down. But Mr. Wiggins refused to be comforted for the overthrow of the great expectations he had built upon his load of cats, and disconsolately drove out of town muttering terrible vengeance, if he ever caught him, upon the depraved individual who had palmed himself off as "cat agent of Van Amburgh's Menagerie."—Fond du Lac Press.

A DOG DOCTOR'S SECRET.—Lap-dogs have their constitutions ruined by dainties, and want of exercise; they become fat, and contract various diseases, when they must either be killed, or else sent to be doctored. The London Field peaks of an old ex kennel-man, who had made a very comfortable income by his peculiar line of practice, which was simply to take the pets, and restore their health and appetite by a severe regimen. A few days before his death, he divulged the secret of his system to the estimable clergy of the parish. "I always tied 'em," said the canine Abernethy, "to a crab-tree at the end of my garden for a week, and gave 'em nothing but water. When I fetched 'em from their mistresses, they refused to eat what I should have been glad to get; and, when they went back, they would eat what I couldn't have touched. I've had some dogs twice or even three times a year, but I always cured 'em at last. One of them was as good as three pounds a year to me. I was terribly fond of him, but he never took to me; and, when he saw me coming for him to bring down his fat, he would waddle away, and howl enough to wake the dead. Dogs haven't got no gratitude."

SAN FRANCISCO, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 17, 1866.

BLACK SHEEP.—A story by Edmund Yates, from Charles Dickens' Magazine, with summary of portions already published, is continued in to-day's CALIFORNIAN.

ENGLAND AND THE UNITED STATES.

IT is unpleasant to find so influential a journal as the New York Times still employing the same vindictive language toward England that was so common and so natural during the war, and immediately after its close. England treated us unjustly, it is true, but it is not wise to dwell forever upon past injustice, when the offending party manifests a change of feeling and intention. England is now undoubtedly disposed to cultivate amicable relations with us. This disposition appears in the changed tone of the leading English papers for nearly a year past, and in other ways equally significant. The New York Times attributes this change altogether to interested and despicable motives, to the English respect for the prosperous and successful cause, and to an awakening apprehension of our power to inflict injuries in return for those we have received, in case of European complications involving Great Britain. This may be true in part; there is an element of policy, of course, in the attitude which one nation assumes toward another; and so far as Governments are concerned it is much the largest, and, in most cases, the only element.

It may sound harsh, but it is nevertheless true, that justice and courtesy are things chiefly practiced by nations and individuals toward their equals. Weakness invites oppression and insult, either direct or indirect; and it is generally sure to meet with them more or less disguised. Strength demands respectful treatment, and gets it. It is romantic to expect England or France to accord us the same consideration in the day of our trouble and weakness, when apparently threatened with speedy dissolution, as in the day of our triumph and increasing power.

But, if the feeling of England toward us has not been friendly, is it altogether unnatural that such should be the case? Are we entirely free from blame in the matter? Have we done nothing to bring about the state of things of which we so bitterly complain? A candid examination of the case will show much in explanation, and something in the way of reasonable justification of an unfriendly feeling on the part of the English people toward us. To say nothing of the blow inflicted on the prestige of England as a naval power during the war of 1812, or of our commercial rivalry with her since, it must be remembered that for many years prior to the outbreak of the rebellion, the whole tone of our press was decidedly, and sometimes furiously anti-English. The corruptions of English society and politics were the favorite themes of Fourth of July speeches, and occasionally even furnished a topic for the exercise of Congressional eloquence. Whenever England got into difficulty either at home or abroad, we sympathized with her enemies. Was there the prospect of war with France or with Russia? Our press, or the bulk of it, was on the anti-English side. Was there a prospect of trouble in Ireland? We did our utmost to encourage it, contributed money to swell the "repeal fund," and lent all our moral support to the threatened insurrection. Surely, in all this, we may find something to account for, and even to extenuate English unfriendliness. We cannot assume the attitude toward England of a party entirely blameless, righteously indignant and refusing to forgive because we have ourselves no forgiveness to ask. Even when our course in reference to English affairs has been essentially just, the tone and language of our public men and of our press has been unnecessarily irritating. At present, if the English people and government are inclined, no matter how mixed their motives, to cultivate amicable relations with us, it would argue something worse than mere folly on our part, to meet their advances with the sullenness born of old animosities.

SAM SMITH, a night watchman in the city of Petaluma has seen the "meteoric showers," which the inhabitants of this metropolis have watched and waited for in vain. Says the Petaluma Argus: "Sam. Smith, night watchman in this city, informs us that last Sunday morning, about two o'clock, a meteor as large as a barn door, sped from north to south, whirring as it went and lighting up the earth as if old Sol was in mid-heaven." A meteor "as large as a barn door," is a phenomenon worth seeing; if we San Franciseans missed the astounding spectacle, we must attribute it to our own lack of faith and vigilance.

ART ITEMS.

THE disagreeable necessity of travelling over half the city to ascertain, from week to week, what new pictures are to be seen, and finding them so few and so widely scattered, leads us to give expression to the hope that we may, before long, see the establishment of a well lighted and accessible art-gallery, free to the admission of all who find enjoyment in the contemplation of good pictures; where may be collected such works of art as are worthy of exhibition, and to which, for public exposition and sale, our resident artists may bring the results of their labors. Such a gallery, under the auspices of some established and responsible society, would be a credit and an ornament to one city, and, however small it may be in the beginning, its promise of success, in due time, is so great, and its object so deserving, as to demand the cordial co operation of artists and lovers of art in taking speedily the preliminary steps for its formation. For such a gallery should be made in one of the structures now being erected for the Mercantile and Mechanics' Libraries, to either of which institutions it would prove a valuable acquisition.

We have seen it heralded as a novel and daring undertaking that Snow & Roos are about to import, for exhibition, Thomas Nast's celebrated picture of "Sherman's March Through Georgia." The artist's name alone is hardly a guarantee of the merit of the production, but as it is a step in the proper direction, however feebly taken, it is deserving of commendation and support, and we await eagerly the arrival of the picture, which is expected to be on view in the early part of December.

Dewey has lately exhibited two views of Mount Tamalpais, apparently beyond the scope of the artist's power, and vastly inferior to most of his marine sketches.

Bush has a view of Merced River, at Jones & Wood's, which shows commendable improvement, being bolder in treatment, richer in coloring, more careful in execution than many of his previously noticed works. His "Glimpse of the Sierras" and "Cape Horn" afforded an opportunity for striking effects, which, however, he utterly failed to produce.

At Snow & Roos' Mr. Young, a new candidate for popular favor, puts forward his first publicly exhibited work, which it would be unfair to criticise in the slightest degree until it is seen out of its dark exhibition-room, where whatever merit it possesses is carefully obscured. ASTRÆA.

"MARK TWAIN'S" FAREWELL BENEFIT.—Bright colored bills circulated throughout the streets yesterday announced that "'Mark Twain's' farewell 'benefit,' tendered by many citizens on condition that he will leave the country forthwith in the steamer which sails next Monday"—a capital hit at the benefit-bore system—would come off on that evening, when a lecture would be delivered at Platt's Hall. A full house was the result, notwithstanding the brief time given for publicity, and the steady fall of rain during the greater part of the day. "Mark's" last lecture, like his first, was repeated with information and amusement, and full of genuine flashes of humor. The lecturer kept his audience fully in hand and constantly interested and amused. It is impossible at this late hour for us to give an extended notice of the lecture before our paper goes to press. We have only time to say, in the way of a benediction, that "Mark Twain," (Samuel Clemens,) departs with the steamer, on Monday next, for New York, bearing with him the best wishes of all who know him for his success and welfare. As a humorist writer and lecturer, we heartily commend him to the press and the public at the East, with full confidence that he will make his "Mark." "So mote it be!"

JUDGE PRATT has decided that the ordinance recently passed by the Board of Supervisors of the City of San Francisco, forbidding the feeding of distillery slops to cows, is unconstitutional and void. Swill-milk may possibly harmonize with the Constitution of California; but we can't be persuaded that it harmonizes with the human constitution, and we trust that if there is no other mode of neutralizing the effect of Judge Pratt's decision, the next Legislature will give their especial attention to the matter.

IT SEEMS that the name of Horace Greeley will be presented as a candidate before the New York Legislature as a candidate for the United States Senate. Greeley does not possess the qualifications for the position. He is an enthusiast and a theorist; a man of great talent in his line, but his line does not lie in the direction of practical statesmanship. Greeley is an idealist, and is utterly unfit for a legislative career.

THE latest news from Washington seems to indicate a determination on the part of our Government to take high ground in regard to the mooted questions between us and England and France, so far as the questions bearing upon Anglo-Confederate pirates and the Mexican empire are concerned.

THE Examiner predicts that in less than ten years the negro labor question will be quite lost in the Chinese labor question. So far as this coast is concerned, the prediction seems probable enough.

CHILDHOOD'S DREAMS.

AS the sky-lark from the meadows
Through the bright spring morn upsoars,
Pouring out the heart's sweet music
At the daylight's jeweled doors,
So, when childhood's hours are joyous
In the glory of their spring,
Do our hearts' deep aspirations
Upward soar on lightsome wing;
And we tread so near the portals
Of the realms beyond the sky,
We can almost hear the waving
Of the angels' pinions nigh;
We can almost hear the anthems
That the heavenly choirs intone,
As they stand amid the glory
Flashing from the Maker's throne.
Then no thought of sadness wakens,
Casting shadows o'er our life,
And we deem not that the future
Holdeth aught of hate or strife;
Or that those we meet in friendship
May prove traitors to their faith,
And the hearts to us the truest
Become still and cold in death;
Never dreaming, never deeming
That all earthly joys are dross,
And our only hope the Christian's—
Christ eternal, and His cross. M. A. F.

CORRESPONDENCE.

CITY GUARD TARGET EXCURSION.

To the Editor of the Californian:

THE City Guard, Captain Geo. W. Granniss, held their twelfth annual parade for target practice, on Monday last, at the Encinal Park. I send you the following report of the proceedings to be published in your paper, if you think it of sufficient interest:

The Company turned out with full ranks, accompanied by their drum corps, and the Second Artillery Band, which also furnished exquisite dance music during the day. A large number of invited guests were present, including over fifty ladies, all of whom appeared to enjoy the occasion thoroughly. The first, second and third regular prizes were won respectively by Privates Poindexter, Davis and Riley; the special prize (a diamond pin), contributed by the invited guests for the best single shot, was won by Private Jourden; a special prize (a gold chain), contributed by a guest for the best shot among the commissioned officers, was won by Captain Granniss; a special prize (gold and silver medal), offered by Corporal Vandyke and Private A. R. Howe for the best shooting by "recruits," was won by Private Poindexter; the leather medal was awarded to Private Dan. E. Webb. The Company and guests returned to the city about dark, heartily pleased with the success of their excursion. We believe the City Guard contemplate giving musical and other entertainments in their Armory, and we have no doubt that their lady friends will gladly lend the sunshine of their presence on every such occasion. MR. DWINELLE'S ORATION.

To the Editor of the Californian:

Mr. J. W. Dwinelle, in his address before the Pioneers on the 7th of September, gave what purported to be the text of two speeches made at a junta held on the 15th of June of that year, at Santa Barbara: Pio Pico speaking in favor of a transfer of California to Great Britain, and M. G. Vallejo for annexation to the United States. In the pamphlet copy of the address the speeches are represented to have been made, not at the junta—which never was held—but at an informal meeting at the house of José Castro; and the speeches, as Mr. Dwinelle says, were reduced to writing at the time by Thomas O. Larkin. I would like to know what authority there is for the statement that Mr. Larkin took down these speeches, and that such speeches were delivered. I admit that Pico leaned to Great Britain as Vallejo did to the United States; but that fact, well known to old residents, is the only evidence within my reach to substantiate Mr. Dwinelle's contribution to the history of the State. Will he give us some other evidence? H.

IT SEEMS that Mr. Reade's letter has proved a capital advertisement for Griffith Gaunt. The New York Weekly Review, says that 20,000 copies of it have been sold, and the demand is not yet appeased. After all, the Bulletin's theory, that Reade intentionally wrote that coarse and angry letter, with a commercial end in view, does not seem wholly improbable.

THE New York Herald, commenting upon the deaths of John Van Buren and Dean Richmond, the two great leaders of the New York Democracy, wickedly says: "The death of the party, and of its great leaders at the same time, is a remarkable coincidence."

THE ARTICLE on the sixth page of our present issue, entitled "Music and Piano-Playing," can scarcely fail to prove highly interesting to those of our female readers who aspire to a high grade of excellence as performers upon the piano.

The Celestial Fireworks.

THE people of San Francisco have been shamefully imposed on. They were promised by all the astronomers in the world, and by the Daily Call, Times, Alta, and Bulletin, as well as by some twenty-five weekly papers, a grand display of shooting stars during this week. The Dramatic Chronicle, we have every reason to believe, had a firm faith in the statements of the astronomers. It proved its faith by works. In Wednesday's issue, it published the following "star notice":

"☞ The 'Celestial Fireworks' to night. Positively no further postpouement."

As an announcement at the head of the editorial columns of the aforesaid paper informs the public that "star notices are charged twenty cents per line each issue," it is probable that this energetic paper will lose at least sixty cents in consequence of the promised exhibition not having been given. Henceforth, let astronomers hide their diminished heads. San Francisco will have no more faith in them than in astronomical almanacs which publish prophecies of sublunary events founded on observations of the movements of the heavenly bodies. To take another view of this subject: isn't it delightful to reflect on the coolness with which the inhabitants of this small planet looked forward to a scattering of "stars," which might, for all most of them knew to the contrary, be worlds inhabited by living beings? No doubt, when our world forms one of a "shower of stars," visible by the inhabitants of the northern portion of Arcturus, the Arcturian ladies will exclaim, "Dear! how pretty!" and never trouble their heads with thinking how we feel. It is all very well for astronomers to talk about "fixed stars"; but which of them can tell us for how long these stars are fixed, or how the inhabitants, if there are any, will be "fixed," when the stellar system is distributed, or knocked into pi—to use a typographical term? San Francisco people are grumbling because they have not seen this shower of stars, which the astronomers and the daily papers promised them; but perhaps, if they reflect that it is possible that this nice little world of ours may some day be one of a shower of stars, they won't be so anxious to witness these seeming eccentricities in Nature. Even supposing that these "falling stars" are only masses of heated metal, it would be uncomfortable to be hit by one of them. All things considered, we don't care if there is never another shower of falling stars more severe than those which may be seen every year in the months of August and November.

The Flying Ship.

The town is already aware of a rumor that a balloon-ship, or an "aerial steam car" of some description, has been secretly built in this city, and is to make an experimental or trial trip, on or about the second of December; but very few regard this as anything more than a rumor, or are at all prepared to see the flying machine start from the top of Rincon or Telegraph Hill. Two things, however, seem to be certain in regard to this sensational subject: in the first place, a company has actually been formed for the purposes of aerial navigation, and, in the second, some sort of a machine, which they call an "Avitor," has been built, or is being built, with great secrecy, somewhere in this city—it is said, in a subterranean workshop on Market street; though most persons are skeptical as to the existence of any such "subterranean workshop" on said street. Furthermore, the company appear to have a "paid poet" in their employ; and they have recently published a graphic anticipatory picture of the starting of the "Avitor" on her first voyage, commencing in the following bold imaginative strain:

"The time is drawing near
When the world, amazed, shall see
The AVITOR appear
In her wondrous flying gear,
To sail the upper sea
With an undulating motion,
Like a swan on Woodward's lake,
Or a gull upon the ocean!

"Will men believe their eyes,
When, like a swallow's flight,
She goes sailing through the skies,
While shouts of wonder rise
From all who view the sight—
Will they believe their eyes?"

The astonishment and confusion of our capitalists and men of wealth, upon seeing the success of this new "power of the air," and beginning to realize its effects upon investments, are thus graphically delineated:

"What will John Center say,
And John Sime, and Peder Sather,
And the elders shrewd and gray?
I guess they'll weaken, rather—
Will weaken when they see
How she floats above the bay
With flags and streamers gay;
And their hard old heads they'll shake,
Half doubting they're awake,
As blinking they discover
That PROGRESS is not over!

"Then they'll swear and tear their hair,
(Those that may have to tear)
And groan: "What fools we were!
For it's plain this ship of air,
This aerial steam car,
WILL PAY, and better far
Than Dutch Flat, or steamboat shares,
Or telegraphic wares—
O wondrous Avitor!"

As to citizen Center, his consternation in prospect of the revolutions likely to succeed this new era in the history of navigation is said to have been such, that he has not only sold out his railroad shares, but actually parted with his interest in the famous "Mission Creek Navigation Company"—his pet investment. Meantime, we should like to have the views of the Flag on the subject of the probable effect of the success of the new experiment upon the solvency of the Bank of California.

Information Wanted.

The Bulletin last week devoted nearly a column of its space to an article on "Personal Advertisements." The writer indulged in many speculations as to what might be the meaning of many of these advertisements, but could of course give no reliable interpretation of them.

The Bulletin published an advertisement in its issues of Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, concerning the meaning of which we are sure the public would be pleased to have some information. It is addressed to the editor of the Bulletin, but since it is published as an advertisement the public must be supposed to have an interest in it. It runs as follows:

Mr. Editor—Sir—I would inform you, for your especial edification and future guidance, that the gentleman to whom you have reference, who was in love, was born in Gibraltar, and is, therefore, not a half-breed, but, on the contrary, to the manor born, and justly entitled to the appellation of a FULL BLOODED Spaniard. The party to whom you allude is of illustrious habits, well educated, of gentlemanly deportment, and possessed of sufficient brains to prove no mean adversary in a trial of intellectual capabilities, and can, furthermore, substantiate his assertion by deeds, not words alone.

SAN FRANCISCO, November 9, 1866.

It appears to us that the person who has paid for three insertions of this advertisement has wasted his money, if the information contained in it is for the "especial guidance" of the editor of the Bulletin. It would, one would suppose, have been sufficient to inform the editor by letter, that the young gentleman, "who was in love," was "entitled to the appellation of a FULL BLOODED Spaniard." If the editor has accused this young gentleman—who was in love—of being a half-breed, the young gentleman might, laying aside all the rules of good breeding, have obtained more satisfaction for the injury done him by punching the editor's head. It appears, however, that he, or some friend, prefers rather to heap coals of fire on the head of the insulting editor by sending an advertisement to be published in his paper. We hope that the editor who wrote that article on "Personal Advertisements," which appeared in papers published in other parts of the world, will employ himself in giving the public some information concerning this young man who was in love, and who, it appears, has been called a "half-breed" by the Bulletin. The public would like to know when the young man was in love, where he was in love, and with how many he was in love, and what was the name of the manor to which he was born in Gibraltar.

Swill-Milk.

The Board of Supervisors are not infallible. Their ordinance forbidding cows to drink distillery swill, and milkmen to sell the milk produced by drunken cows, has been pronounced illegal by Judge Pratt. We never, for one moment, supposed that the Courts would sustain this ordinance of the Supervisors. Judge Pratt, in his decision, says:

"The vice and illegality of the order consists in its determination, without proof, that still slops are calculated, when fed to milch cows, to render the milk of such cows unwholesome or unsuitable for human food. It may be that it is, but before one can be found guilty of a public offense for violating the sanitary regulations of the city, in that behalf, it must not be assumed, but satisfactorily proven, that such animals so fed produce, as a consequence, milk unsuitable for its ordinary uses."

Judge Pratt is right. Let the Honorable Board of Supervisors choose three of their body to test this question and supply the necessary proof that swill-milk is unwholesome. Let three Supervisors be fed on swill-milk for six months, and then let them be examined as to their state of health. Or let the cow "Rowell" be milked in the Hall of Supervisors every Monday evening, and let the Supervisors drink the milk. Or, if this is objected to, let Blitz be fed on swill-milk for a specified period of time. We must have proof. Perhaps, after all, Eben Johnson and the cow "Rowell" will turn out to be persecuted animals.

A Remarkable Dream.

M'lle Rosa Celeste, the funambuliste, whose great ambition it is to walk from America to Canada on a rope stretched across Niagara Falls, and who, we have no doubt, is fully competent to accomplish this feat, had a remarkable dream the other night. She dreamed that she was in the presence of thousands performing this feat. When she was about midway between the American and Canadian shores, she felt fatigued, and so strong was the heaving of her breast that it broke all the hooks and eyes off her dress, which fell from her and shot down the falls. Still she steadily proceeded on her way; at last the Canadian shore was almost gained. As she was about to land, a regiment of red-coated soldiers charged at her with leveled bayonets and told her to go back. She asked, "Why will you not let me land? I am tired; I cannot again traverse that narrow bridge." The red coats yelled furiously, "Back! back! you are a Fenian; you cannot land on these shores wearing that color." Alas! underneath her dress, which so unfortunately fell off, she wore a green skirt, and as in Canada "they are hanging men and women now for wearing of the green," of course she had to retrace her steps; slowly and painfully she walked on her way back to the land of liberty; but at length she tottered; her balance-pole fell from her hands, and down, down, she plunged into the depths below, and with a long-drawn breath—awoke from her dream.

The Latest Sensation.

The Round Table has told the world that American ladies are terrible drinkards; that they paint their faces an inch deep, and misconduct themselves in various other ways. The last sensational accusation brought against them is, that they have no babies. It is the English, Irish, Scotch, German, and French women, who are populating America, we are told by an Eastern paper. New England produces scarcely any real American babies. We are told that about three-fourths of all the children born in Boston, during 1865, were of parents born in foreign lands, and therefore the Yankee stock will soon die out in New England. This is a terrible state of things, but we are not much alarmed about California. The baby crop here is very plentiful every year; swill-milk does not lessen it; children swarm like bees in every street in San Francisco, and healthier or prettier looking children were never seen. It does not very much matter whether the parents of the rising generation of Americans were born on this continent or in some foreign land; the children are Americans, and their children's children will be Americans. We wonder what will be the next yarn which these truthful and wonderfully polite newspapers will invent about the women of America. No American babies, forsooth!

Mrs. Woxcackle on "Griffith Gaunt," and Matters Ecclesiastical.

MR. EDNYTER:—I'm reddy to own up to my share of curyosity, and after all the talk I heard about that new novel wich was said by some to be so shocking, of course I wanted to read it, in the expectashun of finding some things wich would be bily improper for young people to read, and must say, after a careful perooosal, I find myself grately disappointed, there being nothing in it so far as I can see to raise a blush into the cheak of innersense, and the whole thing is, to my mind, an impersishun and a trick to sell the book, wich at ennyrate I, for one, would not have giv a dollar for if I'd have known it was jest a common every day novel, nothing in it being half as objectionable as that artikle about tilters a hundred years ago, wich appeared in your paper last week, copied oat of the Spectator, a paper I never heerd of, and never wish to see, as it is too low and vulgar to be received into genteel families, and indeed that you should publish such seems to me astonishing.

And so it seems Mr. Eagan's not going; and Front street is going to support him against the Bishop, and set him up inderpendent if it comes to the worst; this is disgraseful. The idee of such skandalus doins, and resisting what our minister calls "the ekklesyastikul authority," is shocking! I, for one, don't approve of it, and don't believe in a church without a Bishop, wich would be no better than downrite Presbyterinism. As to Mr. Woxcackle, he is all taken up with the new idee, and says he'll back Eagan anyhow, Bishop or no Bishop." For my part I can't see nothing aristokratik about "a charch without a Bishop," and don't think our best sosyity will patrunize enny such institooshun." Mr. Woxcackle, whose noshans I am sorry to say, never was elevated, always objected to my manuvers to git into sosyity by takin' a pew in Grace etsettery; he never could git it thro' his head that in this city money judishusly ased can do any think, and that the electe here air them that have made money. As to Mr. Eagan, I think it would he better if he had never visited these shores; for he has made disturbunce where all was pece. Some of our most fashunable ladies, moving in good sosyity, air nearly crazy about him, and one of the most fashunable of all, and the most aristicratic, sed to him last week (I have it on good authority), "Mr. Eagan, I adore you! I could fall down at your feet and worship you." This cum unfortunitly to Mr. Woxcackle's ears, and he says (scoffing-like), that women air sech weak vessels that ministers and doctors can do anythink with them, which I know not what he means.

Yours respectfal, MARIA WOXCACKLE.

VIENNA.—Although Vienna is already a vast city of nearly thirteen miles in circumference, yet the amount of improvement and building that is going forward is very great. The old city Stadt is about three miles in circumference, and was built chiefly in the middle ages, and was consequently densely packed together within a wall that was erected for defense. It is a curious old honeycomb, that old city. The streets run crowdedly about. They are generally only from ten to twenty feet wide, often not more than eight; the houses tower many stories high, and away down between them the sun is scarcely ever seen. Hundreds of houses are built entirely over the street, so that carriages drive directly through the house, as it were, under the arched ways, long and narrow and dark. Gas burns here day and night. It is surprising what a limited extent of room a poor family will occupy, the tradesman working in the same room occupied by his family. Here you are shaved for two and a half cents, your boots are mended for five cents, you can make a substantial dinner of soup, beef, potatoes and pudding for fourteen cents, etc.

The same pavement of solid, square stones extends all the way across the street, and you walk in the middle or at the side, as you can find room among the rattling carriages. You seldom enter a hotel or a store, or a large private dwelling from the front, but go in the coach-way, which leads into the inner court, and turn to the right or left

BEAUTY OF THE HEAVENS.—How delightful to contemplate the heavens! We can find no limit, no boundary. Millions of miles may be traversed from any given point of space, and still the heavens appear illimitable. Infinity is stamped upon them. And with what gorgeous splendor and magnificence is that curtain adorned! In every direction it is studded with worlds, suns and systems, all harmoniously moving in perfect and undeviating obedience to the Almighty will. The soul, in such a contemplation, is absorbed. Earth ceases to hold us with its silver chain. The mind, set free from groveling pursuits, mounts up as on the wings of an eagle, and soars away through immensity of space, surveying and admiring the innumerable revolving orbs, which, like so many "crowns of glory" and "diadems of beauty," bespangle that firmament "whose antiquity is ancient days," and which so wonderfully attest that "the hand that made them is divine!"

The immense distance of the fixed stars claims our attention, and awakens the most enrapturing feelings in the mind. Reason is compelled to give the reins to imagination, which tells us that there are stars so distant that their light has been shining since the creation, and yet, amazingly rapid as light travels, no ray from them has yet reached us!

THE new German Confederation will be able to muster an army of one million one hundred and sixteen thousand men.

MEDICAL ADVICE.

DR. WM. K. DOHERTY'S Medical and Surgical Institute is becoming a sine qua non to the welfare of our State and health of our citizens; and his rapidly spreading reputation, although it may excite surprise, is but the signal of skill, and follows as the natural effect of such a cause. We are personally acquainted with gentlemen who had suffered for years under chronic disease, and who had taken advantage of every available means that promised relief, but without success, until they called upon Dr. Doherty, who, in an incredibly short space of time, has given them entire relief. It is gratifying to announce this fact, because the Doctor is a gentleman who seeks, not by defamation of others, to establish his reputation, or to rear the superstructure of his own upon the ruin of another's fame. The Doctor conducts his Institute in a manner that must be gratifying to all his patients. He examines, hears, advises, and recommends, without charge, and the patient, after hearing his terms for treatment, can accept or reject at pleasure. In no case does the Doctor make a charge unless he effects a cure. This he is able to do, because he feels the confidence which long experience has given, and no doubt the consolation which appertains to that confidence. Persons afflicted with either acute or chronic disease, would do well to consult the Doctor; at all events, it can do no harm, as for consultation he asks no fee; nor does he insist on obedience to his advice unless the patient places himself under his care. His offices are on Sacramento street, opposite the Pacific Mail Steamship office.—San Francisco News.

CIRCUMSTANCE.

THE ORANGE.

IT ripened by the river banks,
Where—musk und moonlight aiding—
Dons Blas and Juan play sad pranks,
Dark Donnas serenading.

By Moorish maiden it was plucked,
Who through the grove was stealing;
By Saxon sweetheart it was sucked,
Who flung away the peeling.

She eonld not know in Pimlico,
As little she in Seville,
That I should reel upon that peel,
And find my proper level!

FRENERICK LOCKER.

ABEL McAdam—may his tribe increase!
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the gas-light of his room
A female spirit (dressed up a la Bloom-
Er) writing something in a book of gold.
Exceeding drink had made McAdam bold;
And to the presence in the room he said,
"What writest, dear?" The spirit raised its head,
And with a voice like that of cooing dove,
Murmured: "The names of men whom women love!"
"And is mine one?" asked Abel. "No, sir-ee,"
Replied the spirit. Abel roared with glee,
Then coolly said, "Sweet spirit, write me as one
Who ne'er finds fault with what a woman's done."
The Bloomer wrote and vanished; but the next night
It eume again, with a great wakening light,
And showed the numes by love of woman blessed;
When, lo! McAdam's name led all the rest!

IVORY.—The number of elephants that must be destroyed annually to meet the demand for ivory is absolutely enormous. It is stated on good authority that the cutlery establishments of Sheffield alone consume annually the ivory which is supplied by slaying more than twenty thousand elephants, and every country must also have its supply. The other sources from which ivory is obtained—the walrus, the narwhal, etc—afford but an insignificant item in the supply; and as no other substance has been discovered or invented which can take its place, and as the demand is constantly increasing from year to year, it would seem that the race of elephants may before long become extinct. The best ivory known is that which comes from Africa, for, though it is not so white as that furnished by the Asiatic elephants, it preserves its color best, is most transparent, freest from cracks, and receives the highest polish. This is owing to the fact that the African ivory contains about equal parts of animal and earthy matter, while in the Asiatic the proportion of earthy matter is greater.

JEST KIND O' WENT AWAY.—"Good morning, Reuben." "Morning, Squire; very fine day for the crops." "Yes, but what is the matter with your face, Reuben? You have had a fight, I fancy." "Why, yes, Squire, me, and Jim Hockins, we had an old grudge, and last night we fit it out." "And which whipped, Reuben?" "Well, Squire, we fit considerable." "Yes, yes, I know, but who whipped?" "Well, Squire, we fit considerable, and—" "Reuben, I suppose you ran?" "Run! I'd rather die." "Well, how was the result?"—"Well, Squire, Jim he fit strong, and I was down; good morning, Squire, there's that cow again." "Well, what did you do, you unexplaining Joseph-coat-faced individual! what did you do?" "Well, I didn't run, Squire," said Reuben, sulkily, "I jest kind o' went away."

LONDON.—London is a world in itself. The last English census develops the curious fact that there are more Scotchmen in London than in Edinburg, more Irish than in Dublin, more Roman Catholics than in Rome, and more Jews than in Palestine. Next to London, perhaps, New-York is the most cosmopolitan of cities. It had not so many Scotchmen as Edinburg; but, according to the last census, it has nearly as many Irish as Dublin, while, as a German city, it is probably the third in the world, ranking next to Berlin and Vienna.

"WHY will you persist in wearing another woman's hair on your head?" asked Acid of his wife. She retorted: "Why will you persist in wearing another sheep's wool on your back?"

AGENTS WANTED TO CANVASS FOR THE only official Southern History of the War. THE LOST CAUSE, by E. A. Pollard, the popular Historian of the South, and editor of the Richmond Examiner during the war. Complete in one large royal octavo volume, with

24 FINE STEEL PORTRAITS,

giving a full and authentic account of the rise and fall of the late Southern Confederacy. Written under the encouragement of Generals R. E. Lee. Johnston, Beauregard and others. The work is being liberally patronized by leading men of all classes, eager to hear

"THE OTHER SIDE,"

and thus arrive at the truth of history, which it is impossible to do from the many histories written only from a Northern stand-point.

Agents and the public are cautioned against any other work purporting to be this one. To energetic men and women a rare chance is offered to make money. Don't fail to send for circulars of this great and important work. Adddress

AYER'S

Cathartic Pills,

ARE THE MOST PERFECT purgative which we are able to produce, or which we think has ever yet been made by anybody. Their effects have abundantly shown to the community how much they excel the ordinary medicines in use. They are safe and pleasant to take, but powerful to cure. Their penetrating properties stimulate the vital activities of the body, remove the [illegible] of its organs, purify the blood, and expel disease. They purge out the foul humors which breed and grow distemper, stimulate sluggish or disordered organs into their natural action, and impart a healthy tone with strength to the whole system. Not only do they cure the every-day-complaints of everybody, but also formidable and dangerous diseases. While they produce powerful effects, they are at the same time, in diminished doses, the safest and best physic that can be employed for children. Being sugar-coated, they are pleasant to take; and, being purely vegetable, are free from any risk of harm. Cures have been made which surpass belief, were they not substantiated by men of such exalted position and character, as to forbid the suspicion of untruth. Many eminent clergymen and physicians have lent their names to certify to the public the reliability of our remedies, while others have sent us the assurance of their conviction that our Preparations contribute immensely to the relief of our afflicted, suffering fellow men.

The Agent below named is pleased to furnish gratis our American Almanac, containing directions for the use and certificates of their cures, of the following complaints.

Costiveness, Billious Complaints, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Heartburn, Headache arising from foul stomach, Nausea, Indigestion, Morbid Inaction of the Bowels and pain arising therefrom, Flatulency, Loss of Appetite, all Diseases which require an evacuant medicine. They also, by purifying the blood and stimulating the system, cure many complaints which it would not be supposed they could reach, such as Deafness, Partial Blindness, Neuralgia and Nervous Irritability, Derangements of the Liver and Kidneys, Gout, and other kindred complaints arising from a low state of the body, or obstruction of its functions.

Do not be put off by unprincipled dealers with other preparations which they make more profit on. Demand AYER'S and take no others. The sick want the best aid there is for them, and they should have it.

Prepared by J. C. AYER & CO., Lowell, Mass., and sold by

CRANE & BRIGHAM, San Francisco, and all Dealers

HAPPY AM I.

SAFE in my corner I look on the dancing;
Happy am I;
Careless alike of the twinkling and glancing
Feet as they fly,
And the glancing hours that, so gaily advancing,
Bid us good-bye
Ere we are weary enough of our dancing—
Happy am I.

Safe from my window I gaze, while the prancing
Horses go by;
Why should I keep any thought from romancing?
Careless am I
Whether the music which sabre and lance ring
Shortly shall die,
And the plumes wither low on the crests which are glancing;
Happy am I.

All the world moves in a quickstep, advancing
Faster than I—
I, who am weary of riding and dancing,
Let them go by,
Seeking the pleasure which trouble and chance bring—
Pleasures which fly;
Window and corner will do for romancing—
Happy am I.

W. O. STODDARD.

THE PAST SUMMER.—The summer just closed is said to be the most remarkable that has occured for many years, in the Eastern States, in three particulars: It was in its earliest portion the hottest; in its middle part the wettest; and in its latter portion the coldest of any summer within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. We have had this summer the hot and rainy seasons of the torrid zone, and we have recently had a touch of the cold of the frigid zone.

AT a "spiritual circle," the other evening, a vinegar lady asked: "Is the spirit of my husband present?" when an answer came, "He is." She asked: "John, are you happy without me?" "Very happy." "Where are you, John?" "In h—l." It is further related that the vinegar lady threw a lamp at the medium's head, which had the effect of solving the problem of squaring the circle.

GALLANT.—Fontenelle, at the age of ninety-seven, after saying many gallant and amiable things to the beautiful Madame Helvetius, passed her without perceiving her. "See," said she, stopping and addressing him, "how much I ought to value your gallantries. You pass me without even looking at me." "Madame," said the old man, "if I had looked at you, I could not have passed."

"FAIR" DEALING.—A cunning exhibitor at a recent agricultural fair in Connecticut divided a bushel of peaches and entered one half in his own name for competition, and the other in the name of an influential man in a neighboring town. The "big" man got the prize, and the other contribution, although off the same tree, was not mentioned.

NEWS from Japan informs us that rice has fallen "two boos per picul," if anybody knows what that means.

A FAST STORY.

AN ENGLISHMAN was bragging of the speed of English railroads to a Yankee traveler seated at his side, in one of the cars of a "fast train" in England. The engine bell was rung as the cars neared a station. It suggested to the Yankee an opportunity of "taking down his companion a peg or two."

"What's that noise?" innocently inquired the Yankee.

"We are approaching a town," said the Englishman; "they have to commence ringing about ten miles before they get to a station, or else the train would run by it before the bell could be heard! Wonderful, isn't it? I suppose they haven't invented bells in America yet?"

"Why, yes," replied the Yankee, "we've got bells, but can't use them on our railroads. We run so fast that the train always keeps ahead of the sound: the sound never reaches the village till after the train gets by."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the Englishman.

"Fact," said the Yankee. "Why, we've got one firm in San Francisco that has alone imported this season a half a million dollars' worth of Toys and Fancy Goods. They have Talking and Kicking Dolls, born with a full-grown head of hair and teeth in their mouths, saying 'Papa' and 'Mamma', also, Mechanical Toys, that run by themselves, and lots of other Toy wonders too numerous to mention."

"deed! is that so? Who is the firm that have the Dolls saying 'Mamma's'?" exclaimed the Englishman, very much excited.

"Why, have you never heard in all your travels of FELDBUSH & CO., Wholesale Store, 307 California street, and Retail Store, 207 Montgomery street, San Francisco, where you can save 25 per cent. in purchasing? Fact, I can assure you, as all the goods in their store, 307 California street, and all that is to arrive, must be sold on or before Christmas, on account of some changes in their business. I know it is true, and, if you doubt my word, you call at FELDBUSH & CO.'S, and see for yourself."

STOP THAT COUGHING.

SOME OF YOU CAN'T, AND WE PITY YOU. You have tried every remedy but the ONE declined, by its intrinsic merit, to supersede all similar preparations. It is not surprising you should be reluctant to try something else after the many experiments you have made of trashy compounds foisted on the public as a certain cure. but

NEWELL'S

PULMONARY SYRUP

is really the VERY BEST remedy ever compounded or the cure of Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Asthma, Whooping Cough, Bronchitis and Consumption. Thousands of people in California and Oregon have been already benefited by the surprising curative powers of

NEWELL'S PULMONARY SYRUP,

and with one accord give it their unqualified approbation. We now address ourselves to all who are unacquainted with this, the greatest Panacea of the age, for the healing of all diseases of the Throat and Lungs, assuring you that has cured thousands, and it will cure you if you try it. This invaluable medicine is pleasant to the taste, soothing, healing and strengthening in its effects; entirely free from all poisonous or deleterious drugs, and perfectly harmless under all circumstances.

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup

Certificates from many prominent citizens of San Francisco accompany every bottle of

Newell's Pulmonary Syrup.

HAIR RESTORER.

THIS IS A WONDERFUL DISCOVERY, and stands above comparison with any other article for the Hair ever brought before the public.

A PERFECT

Hair Restorer AND Hair Dresser

BOTH COMBINED IN ONE.

First—It is not a Dye.
Second—Will not Color the Skin.
Third—Will restore Gray Hair to a beautiful Black, Brown, Auburn, or whatever might have been its original color, and cause it to assume its former beauty.
Fourth—Will cure all Humors and Diseases of the Scalp.
Fifth—Will remove Dandruff and Scurf from the head, and keep the hair moist and silk like in its appearance as in youthful days.
Sixth—Will promote a healthy growth.
Seventh—Will prevent it from falling off, and cause it to grow on bald heads where there is life and vitality at the roots, but where these are gone there is no hope of success.
Eighth—The best testimony that can be given will be found inside of each bottle.

Warranted to do all we claim for it, or the money refunded after using two bottles. Try it and be convinced.

Essence of Jamaica Ginger.

THIS VALUABLE PREPARATION, containing in a highly concentrated form all the properties of the Jamaica Ginger, has become one of the most popular domestic remedies for all diseases of the stomach and digestive organs.

As a tonic it will be found invaluable to all persons recovering from debility, whether produced by fever or otherwise, for whilst it imparts to the system all the glow and vigor that can be produced by wine or brandy, it is entirely free from the reactionary effects that follow the use of spirits of any kind.

It is also an excellent remedy for females who suffer from difficult menstruation, giving almost immediate relief to the spasms that so frequently accompany that period.

It gives immediate relief to Nausea, caused by riding in a railroad car, or by sea sickness, or other causes.

It is also valuable as an external application for Gout, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, etc.

OCTOBER.

UPON the brown and far-off hills
The haze lies soft and blue,
While nuts are dropping thick and fast,
Where Summer wild-flowers grew.

The maple's gold and crimson leaves
Like blood-stained banners gleam—
And purple asters ope their bloom
Beside each forest stream.

The woods like some grand temple stand
Beneath the glowing skies,
While down the long dim aisles the haze
Like slumb'ring incense lies.

No organ's deep, majestic notes
Come pealing on the air—
No choral strain triumphant floats
Along those arches fair--

No voice is heard—no sound, save but
The brooklet rippling flow,
Or whistling quail in covert thick,
Where scarlet berries grow.

Perchance some frightened rabbit's tread
May wake an echo there,
Or drowsy hum of honey-bee
Fall on the dreamy air.

The sunflower and the golden-rod
Their gaudy hues unfold,
And seem as if some Midas' touch
Had changed them into gold.

The grapes in purple clusters hang
Upon the clinging vine,
And in the orchard 'mid the leaves,
The ruby apples shine.

But through the forests, o'er the hills
A voice came whisp'ring low—
It murmurs of the wintry winds
And of the falling snow.

The crimsoned leaves to earth must fall,
And breezes o'er them sigh—
O! sad it seems that aught so fair
Should ever fade or die.

We read on every falling leaf
This lesson most sublime,
That Resurrection's holy power
Shall triumph over time.

For though the Summer flower may fade,
The Spring with sun and rain
Shall call them from the hill and vale
To bud and bloom again.

PEASANTS.—French peasants no longer present to the eye those picturesque groups which delighted one fifteen or twenty years ago. The Norman peasant has abandoned her lofty lace cap, broad gold ear-rings, motley kerchief and garish skirt; the Alsatian no longer wears her intricate basket and beads; Provence, Gascony, and other southern proviuces, have thrown aside the bright-colored Madras headkerchiefs coiled like a turban on their heads. Blouses themselves have grown less common. The picturesque peasants are all growing as much alike as cents issued by the same mint.

KIDD'S TREASURES.—Two companies, with a large capital invested, are now busily engaged, the one in South Coventry, Conn., and the other on Oak Island, Nova Scotia, in prospecting for the hidden treasures of the pirate Kidd and his freebooters. The South Coventry Company are sanguine of success, although reticeut, and are working in co operation with the son of an old man named Dodd, who is supposed to have been a guide of Kidd in search of a place to hide his booty.

A CHAP inquired at the post-office in Erie, the other day, for a letter for "Enery Hogden." He was told there was none. "Look 'ere," he replied, a little angrily, "you've hexamined a hodd letter for my name. It don't commence with a haitch! It begins with a ho! Look in the 'ole that's got the ho's!"

BEN'S maiden aunt is a monomaniac as to fresh air. Shivering and cross one cold morning, when all the windows were open, Ben told her, "he believed after she was dead she would get out of her coffin to see that the tomb was properly ventilated."

A PRINTER'S apprentice says that at the office they charge him with all the pi they do find, and at the house they charge him with all they don't find. He does not understand that kind of logic.

EIGHT HUNDRED THOUSAND
IN USE

THE ORIGINAL P. P. STEWART'S FUEL SAVING

Air-Tight Cooking Stoves,

FOR WOOD OR COAL.

IMPROVED IN 1861;

WITH NEW AND EXTRA LARGE FLUES, AND BY THE ADDITION OF THE CELEBRATED PATENT DOUBLE-SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.

Attention is Invited to the following Points of Superiority:

1. DURABILITY.—Lasting, with proper care, at least twenty years. Stoves are now in use that were set up in 1838.

2. MANUFACTURE.—Every portion of the Stove is thoroughly constructed. Each Stove is submitted to a critical test, and none leave our works unless completely and perfectly finished.

3. CAPACITY.—Baking, Boiling, Roasting, and all other culinary operations performed at the same time.

4. ECONOMY.—Saving the cost of the Stove in one year in the cost of fuel.

5. VENTILATION OF OVEN.—In the Stewart Stove alone, the front doors open directly into the oven, (protected by letters patent) securing a direct draft through the top of the oven by means of perforated holes in the doors and back flues. It will be borne in mind that, as the heated air always rises, this method of ventilation is the only one of any value whatever.

6. ENTIRE CONTROL OF HEAT.—The heat generated by the Stove may be held therein and used or thrown into the room at pleasure.

7. THE DOUBLE SHEET BOTTOM FLUE.—By which a compressing and inverting action of heat is obtained, and the oven more evenly and efficiently heated than by any other known invention.

9. HOT WATER RESERVOIR AND WARMING CLOSET.—Both useful and convenient, supplied by the waste heat and without extra fuel.

10. WATER BACK.—An arrangement for supplying hot water for the bath-room equal to any range.

 Beware of numerous imitations in the market, many of which resemble the "Stewart" only in appearance, and none of them possess any of its peculiar qualities.

See that the name of P. P. STEWART is on each Stove. None other genuine.

For sale by CALEB M. SICKLER,

CRADLE SONG.

LITTLE baby, pretty one,
Sleep, sleep, sleep;
Little babe has seen the sun,
Little life has just begun,
May it be a happy one—
Sleep, baby, sleep!

Little baby, pretty sprite,
Sleep, sleep, sleep;
Little closed eyes are bright,
Even kisses must be light,
O thou tender little sprite,
Sleep, darling, sleep!

Little darling, baby, meek,
Sleep, sleep, sleep;
Little tongue that cannot speak,
Little legs as yet so weak,
Must be carried, baby meek—
Sleep, love, sleep!

Little fairy, baby dear,
Sleep, sleep, sleep;
Pretty little ears can bear,
Little eyes are bright and clear,
Little eyes can see, my dear—
Darling baby, sleep!

Tender darling, infant sweet,
Sleep, sleep, sleep;
Little words it shall repeat,
Little babe shall find its feet,
Talk and walk, my baby sweet—
Hush! sleep, sleep!

Pretty baby, little fay—
Sleep, sleep, sleep;
It shall be a lady gay,
Learn to speak, and run and play,
Hush! hush! my little fay,
Sleep, sleep, sleep!

Darling little downy head,
Sleep, sleep, sleep;
Angels stand around thy bed,
Slumber soft upon thee shed,
Screen with wings thy little head—
Sleep, darling, sleep!

Hush! baby, baby dear,
Sleep, sleep, sleep;
There is nothing here to fear,
Mother's here and father's near—
Father's near, my baby dear—
Hush! 'tis asleep.

AN IMPRESSION.

SOME years ago a couple of temperance lecturers (we can name them) had been holding forth in one of our country towns. Business detaining them rather late after the meeting, they went to a tavern to put up for the night, rather than disturb the family where they had been entertained during their stay. Now it was a rum tavern where they sought lodgings, and they resolved to get up betimes in the morning, pay their bill, and leave before the folks were generally stirring. Early morning found them at the bar paying up, but they were not alone. A thirsty customer, whom the spirits had rapped up early, was in the act of taking his "bitters" as they entered. Holding his tumbler in one hand, and the decanter in the other, he paused on observing them, when all at once he hiccoughed out, for he was full of the old grunck,—"Ho d'ye do-o (hic) gentlemen? Gl (hic) a-ad to see ye. Heard ye talk (hic) last night." Here he lifted his glass, and with a "good he ll, genl'men," drank it off. After smacking his lips, and wiping his mouth with the cuff of his coat, he again addressed our friends. "When r'ye goin' to lecsure again (hic) genl'men, I want to go-o'n-n hear ye; had some t-tall talkin' last night, no mistake. Made kons-sirable 'p-pression on me (hic); been dry ever since."

THE EMPRESS EUGENIE.—The present Empress of the French is forty years old. She was born May 5, 1826, in Grenada, Spain, and is the second daughter of the Count de Montijo. On her father's side she is of princely lineage, being descended directly from the kings of old Spain, while through her mother she is connected with the famous Scotch family of Kirkpatrick, a woman closely interwoven with the glories of Robert Bruce. The empress is well known for her beauty; but this is not her only charm. Her many womanly virtues, and the nobleness with which she has fulfilled the duties of her exalted position, have greatly endeared her to her people.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

BESSIE SHIELDS, Plaintiff, vs. PETER SHIELDS, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to PETER SHIELDS, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above-named Plaintiff in the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within Ten Days, (exclusive of the day of service,) after the Service on you of this Summons—if served within this County; or, if served out of this County, but in this District, within Twenty Days; otherwise, within Forty Days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said Complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court, dissolving the Bonds of Matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and for general relief and costs

And you are hereby notified that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and Seal of the District Court of the Twelfth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this 1st day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six.

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE City and County of San Francisco, State of California:

In the matter of the Estate of BENJAMIN P. GREEN, deceased.

It appearing to the Court, by the petition presented and filed by Thomas Courtis, the Administrator of the Estate of Benjamin P. Green, deceased, praying for an order to sell Real Estate, that it is necessary to sell the whole of the Real Estate to pay the debt outstanding against the deceased, and the debts, expenses, and charges of the administration,

It is therefore ordered by the Court, that all persons interested in the said Estate appear before the said Probate Court on Monday, the 25th day of November, A. D 1866, at eleven o'clock A. M. of the said day, at the Court-room of said Probate Court, in the City Hall in said City and County of San Francisco, to show cause why an order should not be granted to the said Administrator to sell the whole of the Real Estate of deceased, as prayed for in said petition; and that a copy of this order be published at least four successive weeks in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated October 23d, A. D. 1866.

M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

OFFICE OF THE COUNTY CLERK, Of the City and County of San Francisco, } ss.

I, WM. LOEWY, County Clerk of the City and County of San Francisco, and ex officio Clerk of the Probate Court thereof, do hereby certify the foregoing to be a full, true, and correct copy of an order duly made and entered upon the minutes of the said Court.

Witness my hand, and the seal of said Court, this 26th day of October, A. D. 1866.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

DANIEL O'NEIL, Plaintiff, vs. JOHN CHAPMAN ET AL., Defendants

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, and the complaint filed in the City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to JOHN CHAPMAN, M. LAUFENBERGER, and MARGARET BAUSCH, Defendants.

You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, a copy of which accompanies this summons, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this Summons—if served within this county; if served out of this county, but within this Judicial district, within twenty days or if served out of said district, then within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Court for the foreclosure of a certain mortgage, described in the complaint, and executed by the said John Chapman on the first day of May, A. D. 1866, to secure the payment of a certain promissory note of even date therewith, made and executed by the said Defendant Chapman, whereby he promised to pay to the Plaintiff the sum of two thousand dollars in gold coin of the United States, in ee years from the date of the said note, with interest thereon at the rate of one per cent per month, payable quarterly in gold coin, that is to say, at the end of every three months, and in case default be made in the payment of the said interest, or any part thereof, when the same becomes due, then the whole of the said principal and interest shall be due; that the premises conveyed by said mortgage may be sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment, in United States gold coin, of said sum of $2,000, with interest thereon according to the terms of said note, and the costs of suit; and in case such proceeds are not sufficient to pay the same, then to obtain an execution against said John Chapman for the balance remaining due, and also that the said Defendant, and all persons claiming by, through or under them may be barred and foreclosed of all right, title, claim, lien, equity of redemption, and interest in and to said mortgaged premises, and for other and further relief.

And if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the Plaintiff will take default against you, and apply to the Court for the relief demanded in the complaint.

Given under my hand and the seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District, this second day of October in the year of our Lord one thousand, eight hundred and sixty-six. WM. LOEWY, Clerk

By G. C. LETCHER, Deputy Clerk.

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO, STATE OF CALIFORNIA:

In the matter of the Estate of EDWARD RODMAN, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of EDWARD F. STONE, the Administrator of the Estate of EDWARD RODMAN, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the Estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid; and that a portion of said Estate remains to be distributed to the heirs of said deceased; and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said Estate among the persons entitled,

It is ordered, that all persons interested in the Estate of EDWARD RODMAN, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the City and County of San Francisco, at the Court-room of said Court, in the City Hall in said City and County, on Thursday, the 29th day of November, 1866, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said Estate to the heirs of said EDWARD RODMAN, deceased, according to law.

And it is further ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks before said 29th day of November, 1866, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County.

Dated October 24th, A. D. 1866.

IN THE PROBATE COURT OF THE CITY and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Estate and Guardianship of MARY KEENAN, THOMAS KEENAN, and JOHN PETER KEENAN, minors.

Order to show cause on application of Guardian for order of sale of Real Estate.

It appearing to this Court, from the petition this day presented and filed by THOMAS BREEZE, the Guardian of MARY KEENAN, THOMAS KEENAN, and JOHN PETER KEENAN, minors, praying for an order of sale of certain Real Estate belonging to his said wards, that it is necessary and for the benefit of said minors that such Real Estate should be sold,

It is hereby ordered, That the next of kin of the said wards, and all persons interested in the said Estate, appear before this Court on MONDAY, the third day of December, A. D. 1866, at eleven o'clock, A. M., at the Court-room of this Court, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, then and there to show cause why an order should not be granted for the sale of such Estate.

And it is further ordered, That a copy of this order be published at least three successive weeks, before the said day of hearing, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in said City and County of San Francisco.

Dated November 1st, 1866.

IN THE DISTRICT COURT OF THE FIFteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco.

LUCY J. PRINCE, Plaintiff, vs. LOUIS M PRINCE, Defendant.

Action brought in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and the complaint filed in the said City and County of San Francisco, in the office of the Clerk of said District Court.

The People of the State of California send greeting to LOUIS M PRINCE, Defendant: You are hereby required to appear in an action brought against you by the above named Plaintiff, in the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, and to answer the complaint filed therein, within ten days (exclusive of the day of service) after the service on you of this summons—if served within this county; or, if served out of this county, but in this district, within twenty days; otherwise, within forty days—or judgment by default will be taken against you, according to the prayer of said complaint.

The said action is brought to obtain a decree of this Hon. Court, dissolving the bonds of matrimony existing between Plaintiff and Defendant, and awarding to Plaintiff the sole custody of Louis Prince, the child of said parties, and for general relief.

And you are hereby notified, that if you fail to appear and answer the said complaint, as above required, the said Plaintiff will apply to the Court for the relief therein demanded.

Given under my hand and seal of the District Court of the Fifteenth Judicial District of the State of California, in and for the City and County of San Francisco, this eighth day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six.

STATE OF CALIFORNIA, City and County of San Francisco —In the Probate Court.

In the matter of the Estate of FRANK O. ELDREDGE, deceased.

Order of publication on application for order of sale.

On reading and filing the petition of John S. Bugbee, Administrator, with the will annexed, of the said Estate, praying for an order of sale of the real estate therein described, and it appearing to this Court that there is not sufficient personal estate in the hands of the said Administrator to pay the expenses of administration, and that it is necessary to sell the whole of the real estate of said deceased for the payment of such debts;

It is ordered, That all persons interested in the said estate appear before this Court at the Court room thereof, at the City Hall, in the City and County of San Francisco, on MONDAY, the tenth day of December, 1866, to show cause, if any they have, why an order should not be granted to said Administrator to sell so much of the real estate of the deceased as shall be necessary to pay such expenses of administration.

And it is further ordered, That a copy of the foregoing order be published once a week for four successive weeks, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper published in the City and County aforesaid.

ESTATES UPON WHICH LETTERS OF ADMINISTRATION HAVE BEEN ISSUED, BUT NO PROPERTY RECEIVED.

Letters of Administration have been issued on the following Estates, but no Money or other Property has come into the possession of the Administrator, nor any Fees received thereon. The Property of several Estates consists of claims to land not yet determined:

Robert Dyson, T. B. McManus, John J. Coombs, C. E. Trask, Wm. F. Hamilton, Charles S. Norris, Huling Major, Horace Cole, James E. Calhoun, J. W. Phipps, Julia W. Burns.

The foregoing report includes all the Estates administered upon by me during the year ending June 30th, 1866.

As a number of the Estates are still unsettled, the amount of Fees cannot be stated, but the same will, on final settlement, be 4 per cent. upon the amount administered in each Estate.

All of which is respectfully submitted,
J. W. BRUMAGIM,
Public Administrator.

IN THE PROBATE COURT of the City and County of San Francisco, State of California.

In the matter of the Estate of SAMUEL P. GOODALE, deceased.

Order to show cause why order of distribution should not be made.

On reading and filing the petition of J. W. Brumagim, the Administrator of the Estate of Samuel P. Goodale, deceased, setting forth that he has filed his final account of his administration of the estate of said deceased, in this Court, and that the same has been duly settled and allowed; that all the debts and expenses of administration have been duly paid: and that a portion of said estate remains to be divided among the heirs of said deceased, and praying among other things for an order of distribution of the residue of said estate among the persons entitled:

It is Ordered, that all persons interested in the estate of said Samuel P. Goodale, deceased, be and appear before the Probate Court of the city and county of San Francisco, at the Court room of said Court, in the City Hall in said city and county, on MONDAY, the seventeenth day of December, A. D. 1866, at eleven o'clock, A. M., then and there to show cause why an order of distribution should not be made of the residue of said estate among the heirs of the said Samuel P. Goodale, deceased, according to law.

It is further Ordered, that a copy of this order be published for four successive weeks, before the said seventeenth day of December, A. D. 1866, in THE CALIFORNIAN, a newspaper printed and published in the said city and county.

M. C. BLAKE, Probate Judge.

Dated November 16th, 1866.

Office of the County Clerk of the City and County of San Francisco.—I, Wm. Loewy, County Clerk of the city and county of San Francisco, and ex-officio Clerk of the Probate Court thereof, do hereby certify the foregoing to be a full, true and correct copy of an order duly made and entered upon the minutes of said Court.

Witness my hand and the seal of the said Court, this sixteenth day of November, A. D. 1866.
